

Philadelphia Soc of Friends
July 8
72092

1
Oct. 27 1898

ESSAYS

ON THE

Principles of Morality

AND ON THE

PRIVATE AND POLITICAL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF MANKIND

BY

JONATHAN DYMOND

AUTHOR OF "AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ACCORDANCY OF WAR WITH THE PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIANITY," ETC.

---

"As the will of God is our rule; to enquire what is our duty or what we are obliged to do, in any instance, is, in effect, to enquire what is the will of God in that instance? which consequently becomes the whole business of morality."—PALEY.

ABRIDGED AND REPRINTED BY THE BOOK COMMITTEE OF THE PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF
FRIENDS. TO BE HAD AT FRIENDS' BOOK STORE, NO. 304 ARCH ST., PHILA.
1896.

ELECTROTYPED EDITION.

72092

PRESS OF AUSTIN C. LEEDS,
817 FILBERT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

TO THAT SMALL BUT INCREASING NUMBER
WHETHER IN THIS COUNTRY OR ELSEWHERE, WHO MAINTAIN IN PRINCIPLE, AND ILLUSTRATE BY THEIR PRACTICE, THE GREAT DUTY OF CONFORMING TO THE LAWS OF CHRISTIAN MORALITY WITHOUT REGARD TO DANGERS OR PRESENT ADVANTAGES,
THIS WORK IS RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED.

PREFACE.

---

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

---

The author of this work died in the spring of 1828, leaving in manuscript the three essays of which it consists. We learn from himself that the undertaking originated in a belief (in which he probably is far from being alone) that the existing treatises on moral philosophy did not exhibit the principles nor enforce the obligations of morality in all their perfection and purity; that a work was yet wanted which should present a true and authoritative standard of rectitude—one by an appeal to which the moral character of human actions might be rightly estimated. This he here endeavors to supply.

Rejecting what he considered the false grounds of duty, and erroneous principles of action which are proposed in the most prominent and most generally received of our extant theories of moral obligation, he proceeds to erect a system of morality upon what he regards as the only true and legitimate basis—the WILL OF GOD. He makes, therefore, the authority of the Deity the sole ground of duty, and His communicated will the only ultimate standard of right and wrong; and assumes, "that wheresoever this will is made known, human duty is determined; and that neither the conclusions of philosophers, nor advantages, nor dangers, nor pleasures, nor sufferings, ought to have any opposing influence in regulating our conduct.”

The attempt to establish a system of such uncompromising morality, must necessarily bring the writer into direct collision with the advocates of the utilitarian scheme, particularly with Dr. Paley ; and accordingly it will be found that he frequently enters the lists with this great champion of expediency. With what success—how well he exposes the fallacies of that specious but dangerous doctrine—how far he succeeds in refuting the arguments by which it is sought to be maintained, and in establishing another system of obligations and duties and rights upon a more stable foundation, must be left to the reader to determine.

In thus attempting to convert a system of moral philosophy, dubious, fluctuating, and inconsistent with itself, into a definite and harmonious code of Scripture Ethics, the author undertook a task for which, by the original structure of his mind and his prevailing habits of reflection, he was, perhaps, peculiarly fitted. He had sought for himself, and he endeavors to convey to others, clear perceptions of the true and the right ; and in maintaining what he regarded as truth and rectitude, he shows everywhere an unshackled independence of mind, and a fearless, unflinching spirit. The work will be found, moreover, if we mistake not, to be the result of a careful study of the writings of moralists, of much thought, of an intimate acquaintance with the genius of the Christian religion, and an extensive observation of human life in those spheres of action which are seldom apt to attract the notice of the meditative philosopher.

In proceeding to illustrate his principles, the author has evidently sought, as far as might be, to simplify the subject, to disencumber it of abstruse and metaphysical appendages, and, rejecting subtleties and needless distinctions, to exhibit a standard of morals that should be plain, perspicuous and practicable.

Premising thus much, the work must be left to its own merits. It is the last labor of a man laudably desirous of benefiting his fellow men ; and it will fulfil the author's wish, if its effect be to raise the general tone of morals, to give distinctness to our perceptions of rectitude, and to add strength to our resolutions to virtue.

A BRIEF BIOGRAPHY OF JONATHAN DYMOND.

---

In attempting to compile a biographical sketch of Jonathan Dymond, to accompany the present edition of his "Essays on the Principles of Morality, and on the Private and Political Rights and Obligations of Mankind," it has been a matter of some surprise that the material for such a memorial has proved to be very meager. The explanation is probably to be found in the retiring character of this gifted man, the close application to business which he found needful in maintaining his little family, and the brief period of life allotted him. While therefore, his may be termed an uneventful life, and one devoid of striking incident, it was marked by rare fidelity to duty, the diligent occupation of talents of no common order, combined with a clearness of perception, and maturity of judgment seldom met with in early years.

The thoughtful cast of his mind readily turned toward questions involving some of the highest interests of humanity, and the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom, while in the eminently wise and just conclusions which are reached in his writings, we cannot doubt his intellectual powers were quickened and sanctified by Divine grace, and his course of reasoning guided by that "Spirit of truth" which our Lord promised his willing disciples should "guide them into all truth;" should take of the things of Christ and show them unto them.

It has been long felt that an abridged edition of the valuable treatise above referred to would prove of especial service to schools in the United States, and be the better adapted to the average American reader. With this end in view, there have been omitted chapters which treat of the national Constitution of Great Britain, the system of Ecclesiastical Tythes, and some views relating specifically to English law or usage.

It has also been thought best to omit chapters on Slavery, as well as some other subjects, and a few chapters have been simply abridged. It may be here proper to state that when any alteration has been made from the original text, it consists in omissions only. This course has resulted in the production of a much smaller volume which, while carefully preserving the line of argument on which the author rests his conclusions, it is believed does full justice to his exhaustive and forcible method of dealing with the subject in hand.

---

Jonathan Dymond was born in the year 1796 at Exeter, England, where he generally resided until the close of his life. His parents, John and Olive Dymond, were highly esteemed members, and recognized Ministers in the Religious Society of Friends. They sought early to imbue the hearts of their children with a deep love for their Heavenly Father, and a reverence for the truths of the gospel of Jesus Christ, their Saviour.

The bent of their son Jonathan's mind was soon displayed in a disposition for quiet reverie, so that, from his contemplative habits, and the sagacious observations which he frequently dropped, his brothers playfully termed him "the philosopher." They, as well as he, possessed strong literary tastes, with good conversational powers, while a fondness for discussing subjects of general interest, and often those of graver import, served to train their minds for taking broader views on the leading topics of the day than were generally accepted. In these discussions Jonathan took an earnest part, exhibiting in his boyhood a marked talent for debate.

In person he was slight, and in stature tall, being somewhat above six feet in height. His countenance, which was habitually pale, was brightened by a highly intellectual and winning expression. In manner he was unassuming, his habits were simple and inexpensive. The business in which he engaged on reaching manhood, was that of a "linen draper," and throughout the period of financial depression which prevailed in England during the latter part of his life, his dealings were marked by strict integrity. In the settlement of disputed claims, he was from time to time appealed to by his fellow-citizens, and his mature judgment, as well as nice sense of justice, especially fitted him for the service of an arbitrator, in which he was not unfrequently employed. It was at the conclusion of a wearisome and harassing case of this kind, which had long and closely occupied him, that the disease which eventually proved fatal first made its appearance.

In 1822 he married a member of his own religious persuasion, residing in Plymouth. The tender union thus consummated was however but of brief duration. A daughter and son completed their little family group. The latter was a child of remarkable precocity, but was removed by death when about seven years old. Anna Dymond survived her husband nearly twenty-one years. From a brief memorial written in 1850, the following testimony to her character and worth, will prove of interest. Referring to the period following the death of her beloved companion, it is stated "her consistent Christian deportment entitled her to be ranked among those 'honorable women' whom the apostle styled 'widows indeed.' A series of domestic afflictions marked her progress; but, mournful as she often was, her humble, silent acquiescence with the dispensations of Divine Providence, and her efforts not to allow her sorrows to interrupt the active duties of her every-day life, were deeply instructive. Her removal at a period when her ripened judgment and experience rendered her influence and example very valuable, not only in the social circle, but in the church, is felt to be a great loss. She filled the stations both of 'elder and overseer' in the meeting to which she belonged, and she discharged the duties of these important offices with uprightness and integrity.

"Her health for many years was delicate. Her last illness, which confined her to the house about four months was of such a character as to leave little ground to hope for her recovery, and she soon became aware that it would probably terminate fatally. The resignation, and even cheerfulness which she manifested, and, above all, the Divine support with which she was sustained, were deeply instructive to those whose privilege it was to be her attendants.

"The progress of the disease was very gradual; but becoming considerably weaker, and suffering much from oppression, she said to those about her, 'I hope you will be enabled to pray for me, that I may be speedily released.' Later she petitioned, 'Oh gracious Lord! be pleased to take me home,' and soon after, on a beloved relative calling to see her, she said, 'I trust all will be well! The language "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world" has occurred to my mind, and I can take comfort from it.' On a hope being expressed that she was sensible of feeling the Holy one near, she said that at times such was her blessed experience.

“ Her mental faculties continued clear, and the deep quietness of her spirit was undisturbed, until at the hour of midnight, the 20th of First month, 1849, her redeemed and purified spirit passed away.”

The first work by Jonathan Dymond which appeared in print was entitled “ An Inquiry into the Accordancy of War with the Principles of Christianity,” and this was ready for the press, before any of his nearest relatives, with the exception of his wife and brother William, were aware that he had been preparing it, the former aiding him in correcting the proof-sheets. The origin of this treatise was briefly as follows: The author was a member of a small literary society, consisting of himself, his brothers and a few other young persons, whose contributions were styled the “ Iscan Budget,” (Isca being the ancient Roman name of Exeter). Its meetings were held once a month, when the essays of the members were read and discussed. Among others, some papers on the subject of War were contributed by Jonathan Dymond, and these, when the Association had ceased to exist, were deemed worthy of more permanent preservation. After revision and some modification, they were given to the public in 1823, under the above title.

During the printing and publishing of this work, the active mind of our author had been strongly turned toward the preparation of another, of still broader scope, and designed to meet what he conceived to be a pressing need of his fellow-men of every race and condition. Henceforth he became deeply absorbed in the effort to present to the world an authoritative standard of moral rectitude, based upon the teachings of Christianity as they had been proclaimed by its Divine Founder. By an appeal to such a standard, he was persuaded the character of human actions should be tested, rather than by the shifting rules and maxims which had resulted, too often, from the lower aims, false reasoning, and selfish instincts of men who essayed to be teachers of morality and virtue.

Although he did not live to complete this work to his own satisfaction, nor was he able to revise the latter part of it for printing, sufficient was accomplished to comprise a treatise on Christian Ethics, which has scarcely an equal for the clearness and courage with which it has carried to their legitimate conclusions the plain precepts of the Gospel, whether as regards their practical application to every-day life, the internal government of communities, or the relation of States and Nations. In confirmation of the soundness of its positions it is very observable, that though produced more than half a century ago, views then advanced by Dymond, but rejected as little more than Utopian, have come to be accepted by not a few of the most clear and thoughtful writers of the present day ; many of his suggestions have been carried into successful practice ; while steady advances are being continually made toward those high ideals of Christian faith and conduct which are set forth in the "Essays on the Principles of Morality."

The disorder, already referred to, was now developing into a chronic bronchial affection which prevented the ordinary use of the voice, almost any effort to speak bringing on paroxysms of coughing, so painful, that he found it best to cease speaking altogether, using a slate and pencil which he carried with him, as a substitute. Though in the habit of visiting London periodically in connection with affairs of business, he had never travelled extensively, but now, under the advice of his physician, he sought relief by a change of air and scene at various places in Devonshire recommended for their salubrity.

Early in 1827 he went to London for consultation with some of the most eminent medical men in that city. Among others, he thus met Dr. Thos. Hancock, who became deeply interested in his patient. In a letter to a friend, Dr. Hancock remarked, "I enjoyed but a short and melancholy portion of his society and acquaintance, for it was under peculiar and trying circumstances that I last saw him; yet an impression has been left on my mind that can never I think be removed." "His mind was then remarkably clear and vigorous, and he appeared to be quite free from depressing anticipations with regard to the result of his malady. This proved in the end to be pulmonary consumption."

After his return from London, thirteen weeks were passed at a farmhouse in the neighborhood of Exeter. This was a retired and picturesque spot near the village of Whitestone, and here he was soon diligently employed in preparing for the press the treatise contained in this volume. In the shady lanes around his peaceful retreat, he was wont to seek relaxation from the sedentary labors of composition, a gentle pony carrying him from one favorite rural scene to another. On these rambles, he seldom started, without a copy in his pocket of that sacred volume whose precepts he so highly valued, and to whose inspired pages he was in the habit of constantly referring. For twenty months however, he was obliged to resort to his slate and pencil for the expression of his thoughts or wishes, which, to one of his conversational abilities, must have proved no common trial.

From Whitestone, he thus wrote to a friend in the summer of 1827: "There is a time for all things—and what I add, I add with seriousness; that to feel quiet, and capable of enjoyment amidst trying circumstances, is one amongst the great items of goodness for which we are indebted to our Creator. Although I am not always cheery, yet I have a happy share of that chastened comfort which is perhaps as good for us as more brilliant things." In a letter to his wife in 1828, he writes: "I would not have thee cast down, for I do not think there is cause for being so. Not that there are no fears and no sorrows, but none that are allowed to agitate and alarm me, for myself or for thee. As to the matters of this world, I sometimes try to leave them. To live a day at a time, seems our present business; without over anxiety for greater enjoyment or brighter prospects, in temporals or spirituals either."

On returning to his home at Exeter, he assiduously continued the preparation of his "Essays," a great part of which, as well as his "Inquiry into the accordancy of War with the Principles of Christianity," were written in a little room adjoining his shop, subject to frequent interruptions from customers, in the midst of his most profound and engrossing thoughts.

Of the closing days of Jonathan Dymond, whose decease occurred on the 6th of Fifth month, 1828, at the age of thirty-one, his father, in a letter to Dr. Hancock, writes: "Through the merciful regard of our Holy Head and High Priest, I believe I may venture to say that his mind was kept in perfect peace, and that he was favored while living to experience a foretaste of that state of blessedness into which I dare not doubt his being entered."

The year 1828 proved one of sore bereavement to the family of John Dymond. The letter from him, above referred to, records the death of his daughter, the 8th of Third mo.; his son George, the 24th of Fourth mo.; and Jonathan Dymond, as already stated, the 6th of Fifth mo. "So," the stricken father continues, "in rather less than two months, I have had to experience the loss of three of my children, near and dear to me; not only by the ties of nature, but additionally so, as they were all of them eminently favored with the precious influence of Heavenly love, and concerned in no ordinary degree to live in the fear of Him who called them to virtue, and who, I humbly trust, has received them into glory."

To the close of his well-spent life, Jonathan Dymond bore with remarkable patience and serenity the sufferings and privations attending his failing health. He displayed an entire resignation to the Divine will and a childlike trust in his Heavenly Father, while he was by no means a stranger to that spiritual communion with God, which is the sacred privilege of the true Christian. His estimate of his own religious attainments was exceedingly humble, and on his death-bed he evidenced a deep conviction of that great truth referred to in the concluding words of his "Essays," namely, that the only foundation of our hope for eternity is the mercy of God, "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."

NOTE.—In preparing the foregoing sketch the compiler has drawn largely upon, and used freely, a brief biography of Jonathan Dymond which precedes the American edition of his Essays, published in New York, in 1834. The passing reference to his wife, Anna Dymond, is taken from a short memorial contained in the "Annual Monitor," for 1850.

CONTENTS.

ESSAY I.

PART I.—PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY.

	PAGE
CHAP. I. MORAL OBLIGATION .....	1
Foundation of moral obligation.
CHAP. II. STANDARD OF RIGHT AND WRONG.....	2
The will of God—Notices of theories—The communication of the will of God—The supreme authority of the expressed will of God—Causes of its practical rejection—The principles of expediency fluctuating and inconsistent—Application of the principles of expediency—Difficulties—Liability to abuse—Pagans.
THE WILL OF GOD.....	3
THE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD.....	6
CHAP. III. SUBORDINATE STANDARDS OF RIGHT AND WRONG	21
Foundation and limits of the authority of subordinate moral rules.
CHAP. IV. COLLATERAL OBSERVATIONS.....	23
IDENTICAL AUTHORITY OF MORAL AND RELIGIOUS OBLIGATIONS..	23
Identical authority of moral and religious obligations—The Divine attributes—Of deducing rules of human duty from a consideration of the attributes of God—Virtue: "Virtue is conformity with the standard of rectitude"—Motives of action.
THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.....	25
VIRTUE .....	27
CHAP. V. SCRIPTURE.....	29
The morality of the Patriarchal, Mosaic and Christian dispensations—Their moral requisitions not always coincident—Supremacy of the Christian morality—Of variations in the moral law—Mode of applying the precepts of Scripture to questions of duty—No formal moral system in Scripture—Criticism of Biblical morality—Of particular precepts and general rules. Matt. vii. 12.—1 Cor. x. 31.—Rom. iii. 8.—Benevolence, as it is proposed in the Christian Scriptures.
THE MORALITY OF THE PATRIARCHAL, MOSAIC AND CHRISTIAN DISPENSATIONS .....	29
MODE OF APPLYING THE PRECEPTS OF SCRIPTURE TO QUESTIONS OF DUTY .....	37
BENEVOLENCE, AS IT IS PROPOSED IN THE CHRISTIAN SCRIPTURES .....	49

	PAGE
CHAP. VI. THE IMMEDIATE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD .....	52
Conscience—Its nature—Its authority—Review of opinions respecting a moral sense—Bishop Butler—Lord Bacon—Locke—Southey—Adam Smith—Paley—Milton—Judge Hale—Marcus Antoninus—Epictetus—Seneca—Paul—That every human being possesses a moral law—Pagans—Gradations of light—Prophecy—The immediate communication of the Divine will perpetual—Of national vices: Infanticide: Duelling—Of savage life.
SECTION I. CONSCIENCE, ITS NATURE AND AUTHORITY.....	54
REVIEW OF OPINIONS RESPECTING A MORAL SENSE.....	61
THE IMMEDIATE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD.....	68

---

ESSAY I.

PART II.—SUBORDINATE MEANS OF DISCOVERING THE DIVINE WILL.

CHAP. I. THE LAW OF THE LAND.....	82
Its authority—Limits to its authority—Morality sometimes prohibits what the law permits.
CHAP. II. THE LAW OF NATURE.....	89
Its authority—Limits to its authority—Obligations resulting from the rights of nature—Incorrect ideas attached to the word nature.
CHAP. III. UTILITY.....	96
Obligations resulting from expediency—Limits to these obligations.
CHAP. IV. THE LAW OF NATIONS.—THE LAW OF HONOR .....	102
SECTION I. THE LAW OF NATIONS.....	102
Obligations and authority of the law of nations—Its abuses, and the limits of its authority—Treaties.
SECTION II. THE LAW OF HONOR .....	108
Authority of the law of honor—Its character.

---

ESSAY II.

PRIVATE RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS.

CHAP. I. RELIGIOUS OBLIGATIONS.....	111
Factitious semblances of devotion—Religious conversation: Sabbathal institutions—Non-sauctity of days—Of temporal employments: traveling: stage-coaches: "Sunday papers:"

	PAGE
amusements—Holy days—Ceremonial institutions and devotional formularies—Utility of forms—Forms of prayer—Extempore prayer—Scepticism—Motives to scepticism.
SABBATICAL INSTITUTIONS.....	117
CEREMONIAL INSTITUTIONS AND DEVOTIONAL FORMULARIES .....	123
CHAP. II. PROPERTY.....	133
Foundation of the right to property—Insolvency: perpetual obligation to pay debts: reform of public opinion: examples of integrity—Wills, legatees, heirs: informal wills: intestates—Minor's debts—A wife's debts—Bills of exchange—Unjust defendants—Privateers—Confiscations—Insurance—Settlements—Houses of infamy—Literary property—Rewards.
CHAP. III. INEQUALITY OF PROPERTY.....	156
Accumulation of wealth: its proper limits—Provision for children: "keeping up the family."
CHAP. IV. LITIGATION—ARBITRATION.....	164
Practice of early Christians—Evils of litigation—Efficiency of arbitration.
CHAP. V. THE MORALITY OF LEGAL PRACTICE.....	170
Complexity of law—Professional untruths—Defences of legal practice—Effects of legal practice: seduction: theft: peculation—Pleading—The duties of the profession—Effects of legal practice on the profession, and on the public.
CHAP. VI. PROMISES—LIES.....	188
PROMISES—Definition of a promise—Parole—Extorted promises—John Fletcher.
LIES—Milton's definition—Lies in war: to robbers: to lunatics: to the sick—Hyperbole—Irony—Complimentary untruths—"Not at home."
CHAP. VII OATHS.....	201
THEIR MORAL CHARACTER—THEIR EFFICACY AS SECURITIES OF VERACITY—THEIR EFFECTS.....	211
A Curse—Immorality of oaths—Oaths of the ancient Jews—Milton—Paley—The High Priest's adjuration—Early Christians—Inefficacy of oaths—Motives to veracity—Religious sanctions: public opinion—Legal penalties—Oaths in evidence: parliamentary evidence: courts martial—The United States—Effects of oaths: falsehood—General obligations.
CHAP. VIII. IMMORAL AGENCY.....	223
Publication and circulation of books—Seneca—Circulating libraries—Prosecutions—Political affairs.
CHAP. IX. THE INFLUENCE OF INDIVIDUALS UPON PUBLIC NOTIONS OF MORALITY.....	231
Public notions of morality—Errors of public opinion: their effects—Duelling—Glory—Military virtues—Military talent—Bravery—Courage—Patriotism not the soldier's motive—Military fame—Public opinion of unchastity: in women: in men—Power of character—Character—Character in legal men—Fame—Faults of great men—The press—Newspapers—History: its defects: its power.
CHAP. X. MORAL EDUCATION .....	262
Union of moral principle with the affections—Society—Morality of the ancient classics—The supply of motives to virtue—Conscience—Subjugation of the will—Knowledge of our own minds—Offices of public worship.
CHAP. XI. EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.....	277
Advantages of extended education—Infant schools—Habits of enquiry.

	PAGE
CHAP. XII. AMUSEMENTS .....	283
The Stage—Religious amusements—Masquerades—Field-sports— The turf—Boxing—Wrestling—Opinions of posterity—Popular amusements needless.
CHAP. XIII. SUICIDE.....	291
Unmanliness of suicide—Forbidden in the New Testament—Its folly.
CHAP. XIV. RIGHTS OF SELF-DEFENCE .....	295
These rights not absolute—Their limits—Personal attack—Pre- servation of property—Much resistance lawful—Effects of for- bearance—Sharpe—Barclay—Ellwood.

---

ESSAY III.

POLITICAL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS.

CHAP. I. PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL, TRUTH, AND OF POLIT- ICAL, RECTITUDE .....	308
I. "Political power is rightly exercised only when it is possessed by consent of the community"—Governors, officers of the pub- lic—Transfer of their rights by a whole people—The people hold the sovereign power—Right of Governors—A conciliating system.
II. "Political power is rightly exercised only when it subserves the welfare of the community"—Interference with other na- tions—Present expedients for present occasions—Proper busi- ness of governments.
III. "Political power is rightly exercised only when it sub- serves the welfare of the community by means which the moral law permits"—The moral law alike binding on nations and individuals—Deviation from rectitude impolitic.
I. "POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY POSSESSED ONLY WHEN IT IS POSSESSED BY CONSENT OF THE COMMUNITY" .....		309
II. "POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY EXERCISED ONLY WHEN IT SUBSERVES THE WELFARE OF THE COMMUNITY" .....		314
III. "POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY EXERCISED ONLY WHEN IT SUBSERVES THE WELFARE OF THE COMMUNITY BY MEANS WHICH THE MORAL LAW PERMITS" .....		318
CHAP. II. CIVIL LIBERTY.....	324
Loss of liberty—War—Useless laws.
CHAP. III. CIVIL OBEDIENCE.....	327
Expediency of obedience—Obligations to obedience—Extent of the duty—Resistance to the civil power—Obedience may be withdrawn—King James—America—Non-compliance—Inter- ference of the Magistrate.
CHAP. IV. POLITICAL INFLUENCE.....	338
Effects of influence—Incongruity of public notions—Patronage— Dependency on the mother country.
CHAP. V. MORAL LEGISLATION .....	342
Duties of a ruler—The two objects of moral legislation—Educa- tion of the people—Abrogation of bad laws.

	PAGE
CHAP. VI. OF THE PROPER ENDS OF PUNISHMENT.....	346
The three objects of punishment:—Reformation of the offender:— Example:—Restitution—Punishment may be increased as well as diminished.
CHAP. VII. PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.....	351
Of the three objects of punishment, the punishment of death re- gards but one—Reformation of minor offenders: greater criminal neglected—Capital punishments not efficient as examples —Public executions—Paul—Grotius—Murder—The punishment of death irrevocable—Rousseau—Recapitulation.
CHAP. VIII. RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS.....	365
The primitive church—The established church of Ireland—Amer- ica—Advantages and disadvantages of established churches— Alliance of a church with the state—Persecution generally the growth of religious establishments—State religions injurious to the civil welfare of a people—Voluntary payment.
CHAP. IX. PATRIOTISM.....	387
Patriotism as it is viewed by Christianity—A patriotism which is opposed to general benignity—Patriotism not the soldier's motive.
CHAP. X. WAR.....	392
CAUSES OF WAR.....	395
Want of enquiry: indifference to human misery: national irrita- bility: interest: secret motives of cabinets: ideas of glory— Foundation of military glory.
CONSEQUENCES OF WAR.....	406
Destruction of human life: taxation: moral depravity: familiar- ity with plunder: implicit submission to superiors: resignation of moral agency: Bondage and degradation—Loan of armies— Effects on the community.
LAWFULNESS OF WAR.....	420
Influence of habit—Of appealing to antiquity—The Christian Scriptures—Subjects of Christ's benediction—Matt. xxvi. 52— The apostles and evangelists—The centurion—Cornelius—Sil- ence not a proof of approbation—Luke xxii. 36—John the Bap- tist—Negative evidence—Prophecies of the Old Testament— The requisitions of Christianity of present obligation—Primi- tive Christians—Example and testimony of early Christians— Christian soldiers—Wars of the Jews—Duties of individuals and nations—Offensive and defensive war—Wars always aggressive —Paley—War wholly forbidden.
OF THE PROBABLE AND PRACTICAL EFFECTS OF ADHERING TO THE MORAL LAW IN RESPECT TO WAR.....	458
Quakers in America and Ireland—Colonization of Pennsylvania— Unconditional reliance on Providence—Recapitulation—Gen- eral observations.
CONCLUSION.....	470

INTRODUCTORY NOTICES.

---

Of the two causes of our deviations from rectitude—want of knowledge and want of virtue—the latter is undoubtedly the more operative. Want of knowledge is, however, sometimes a cause; nor can this be any subject of wonder when it is recollected in what manner many of our notions of right and wrong are acquired. From infancy, every one is placed in a sort of moral school, in which those with whom he associates, or of whom he hears, are the teachers. That the learner in such a school will often be taught amiss, is plain.—So that we want information respecting our duties. To supply this information is an object of moral philosophy, and is attempted in the present work.

When it is considered by what excellences the existing treatises on moral philosophy are recommended, there can remain but one reasonable motive for adding yet another—the belief that these treatises have not exhibited the principles and enforced the obligations of morality in all their perfection and purity. Perhaps the frank expression of this belief is not inconsistent with that deference which it becomes every man to feel when he addresses the public; because, not to have entertained such a belief, were to have possessed no reason for writing. The desire of supplying the deficiency, if deficiency there be; of exhibiting a true and authoritative standard of rectitude, and of estimating the moral character of human actions by an appeal to that standard, is the motive which has induced the composition of these essays.

In the First Essay the writer has attempted to investigate the principles of morality. In which term is here included, first, the ultimate standard of right and wrong; and, secondly, those subordinate rules to which we are authorized to apply for the direction of our conduct in life. In these investigations he has been solicitous to avoid any approach to curious or metaphysical enquiry. He has endeavored to act upon the advice given by Tindal the Reformer, to his friend John Frith: "Pronounce not or define of hid secrets, or things that neither help nor hinder whether it be so or no; but stick you stiffly and stubbornly in earnest and necessary things."

In the Second Essay these principles of morality are applied in the determination of various questions of personal and relative duty. In making this application, it has been far from the writer's desire to deliver a system of morality. Of the unnumbered particulars to which this essay might have been extended, he has therefore made a selection; and in making it, has chosen those subjects which appear peculiarly to need the enquiry, either because the popular or philosophical opinions respecting them appeared to be unsound, or because they were commonly little adverted to in the practice of life. Form has been sacrificed to utility. Many great duties have been passed over, since no one questions their obligation; nor has the author so little consulted the pleasure of the reader as to expatiate upon duties simply because they are great. The reader will also regard the subjects that have been chosen as selected, not only for the purpose of elucidating the subjects themselves, but as furnishing illustration of the general principles—as the compiler of a book of mathematics proposes a variety of examples, not merely to discover the solution of the particular problem, but to familiarize the application of his general rule.

Of the Third Essay, in which some of the great questions of political rectitude have been examined, the subjects are in themselves sufficiently important. The application of sound and pure moral principles to questions of government, of legislation, of the administration of justice, or of religious establishments, is manifestly of great interest; and the interest is so much the greater, because these subjects have usually been examined, as the writer conceives, by other and very different standards.

The reader will probably find, in each of these essays, some principles or some conclusions respecting human duties to which he has not been accustomed—some opinions called in question which he has habitually regarded as being indisputably true, and some actions exhibited as forbidden by morality which he has supposed to be lawful and right. In such cases I must hope for his candid investigation of the truth, and that he will not reject conclusions but by the detection of inaccuracy in the reasonings from which they are deduced. I hope he will not find himself invited to alter his opinions or his conduct without being shown why; and if he is conclusively shown this, that he will not reject truth because it is new or unwelcome.

With respect to the present influence of the principles which these essays illustrate, the author will feel no disappointment if it is not great. It is not upon the expectation of such influence that his motive is founded or his hope rests. His motive is, to advocate truth without reference to its popularity; and his hope is, to promote by these feeble exertions, an approximation to that state of purity, which he believes it is the design of God shall eventually beautify and dignify the condition of mankind.

ESSAY I.

PART I.

PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY.

---

CHAPTER I.

MORAL OBLIGATION.

Foundation of Moral Obligation.

THERE is little hope of proposing a definition of moral obligation which shall be satisfactory to every reader ; partly because the phrase is the representative of different notions in individual minds. No single definition can, it is evident, represent various notions ; and there are probably no means by which the notions of individuals respecting moral obligation can be adjusted to one standard. Accordingly, whilst attempts to define it have been very numerous, all probably have been unsatisfactory to the majority of mankind.

Happily this question, like many others upon which the world is unable to agree, is of little practical importance. Many who dispute about the definition, coincide in their judgments of what we are obliged to do and to forbear ; and so long as the individual knows that he is actually the subject of moral obligation, and actually responsible to a superior power, it is not of much consequence whether he can critically explain in what moral obligation consists.

The writer of these pages, therefore, makes no attempts at strictness of definition. It is sufficient for his purpose that man is under an obligation to obey his Creator ; and if any one curiously asks "Why?"—he answers, that one reason at least is, that the Deity possesses the power, and evinces the intention, to call the human species to account for their actions, and to punish or reward them.

There may be, and I believe there are, higher grounds upon which a sense of moral obligation may be founded; such as the love of goodness for its own sake, or love and gratitude to God for his beneficence: nor is it unreasonable to suppose that such grounds of obligation are especially approved by the universal Parent of mankind.

---

CHAPTER II.

STANDARD OF RIGHT AND WRONG.

The Will of God—Notices of Theories—The communication of the Will of God—The supreme authority of the expressed Will of God—Causes of its practical rejection—The principles of expediency fluctuating and inconsistent—Application of the principles of expediency—Difficulties—Liability to abuse—Pagans.

It is obvious that to him who seeks the knowledge of his duty, the first inquiry is, What is the rule of duty? What is the standard of right and wrong? Most men, or most of those with whom we are concerned, agree that this standard consists in the will of God. But here the coincidence of opinion stops. Various and very dissimilar answers are given to the question, How is the will of God to be discovered? These differences lead to differing conclusions respecting human duty. All the proposed modes of discovering his will cannot be the best nor the right; and those which are not right are likely to lead to erroneous conclusions respecting what his will is.

It becomes therefore a question of very great interest—How is the will of God to be discovered? and if there should appear to be more sources than one from which it may be deduced—What is that source which, in our investigations, we are to regard as paramount to every other?

THE WILL OF GOD.

When we say that most men agree in referring to the will of God as the standard of rectitude, we do not mean that all those who have framed systems of moral philosophy have set out with this proposition as their fundamental rule; but we mean that the majority of mankind do really believe (with whatever indistinctness) that they ought to obey the will of God; and that, as it respects the systems of philosophical men, they will commonly be found to involve, directly or indirectly, the same belief. He who says that the "Understanding"* is to be our moral guide, is not far from saying that we are to be guided by the Divine will; because the understanding, however we define it, is the offspring of the Divine counsels and power. When Adam Smith resolves moral obligation into propriety arising from feelings of "Sympathy,"† the conclusion is not very different; for these feelings are manifestly the result of that constitution which God gave to man. When Bishop Butler says that we ought to live according to nature, and make conscience the judge whether we do so live or not, a kindred observation arises; for the existence and nature of conscience must be referred ultimately to the Divine will. Dr. Samuel Clarke's philosophy is, that moral obligation is to be referred to the eternal and necessary differences of things. This might appear less obviously to have respect to the Divine will, yet Dr. Clarke himself subsequently says, that the duties which these eternal differences of things impose, "are also the express and unalterable will, command and law of God to his creatures, which he cannot but expect should be observed by them in obedience to his supreme authority."† Very similar is the practical doctrine of Wollaston. His theory is, that moral good and evil consist in a conformity or disagreement with truth—"in treating every thing as being what it is." But then he says, that to act by this rule "must be agreeable to the will of God, and if so, the contrary must be disagreeable to it, and, since there must be perfect rectitude in his will, certainly wrong."§ It is the same with Dr. Paley in his far-famed doctrine of Expediency. "It is the utility of any action alone which constitutes the obligation of it;" but this very obligation is deduced from the Divine Benevolence; from which it is attempted to show, that a regard to utility is enforced by the will of God. Nay, he says expressly, "Every duty is a duty towards God, since it is his will which makes it a duty."||

* Dr. Price: Review of Principal Questions in Morals.

† Theory of Moral Sentiments.

Now there is much value in these testimonies, direct or indirect, to the truth—that the will of God is the standard of right and wrong. The indirect testimonies are perhaps the more valuable of the two. He who gives undesigned evidence in favor of a proposition, is less liable to suspicion in his motives.

But, whilst we regard these testimonies, and such as these, as containing satisfactory evidence that the will of God is our moral law, the intelligent enquirer will perceive that many of the proposed theories are likely to lead to uncertain and unsatisfactory conclusions respecting what that will requires. They prove that † Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion.

‡ Religion of Nature Delineated.

|| Moral and Political Philosophy.

His will is the standard, but they do not clearly inform us how we shall bring our actions into juxtaposition with it.

One proposes the Understanding as the means; but every observer perceives that the understandings of men are often contradictory in their decisions. Indeed many of those who now think their understandings dictate the rectitude of a given action, will find that the understandings of the intelligent pagans of antiquity came to very different conclusions.

A second proposes Sympathy, regulated indeed and restrained, but still sympathy. However ingenious a philosophical system may be, I believe that good men find, in the practice of life, that these emotions are frequently unsafe, and sometimes erroneous guides of their conduct. Besides, the emotions are to be regulated and restrained; which of itself intimates the necessity of a regulating and restraining, that is, of a superior power.

To say we should act according to the "eternal and necessary differences of things," is to advance a proposition which nine persons out of ten do not understand, and of course cannot adopt in practice; and of those who do understand it, perhaps an equal majority cannot apply it, with even tolerable facility, to the concerns of life. Why indeed should a writer propose these eternal differences, if he acknowledges that the rules of conduct which result from them are "the express will and command of God?"

To the system of a fourth, which says that virtue consists in a "conformity of our actions with truth," the objection presents itself—what is truth? or how, in the complicated affairs of life, and in the moment perhaps of sudden temptation, shall the individual discover what truth is?

Similar difficulties arise in applying the doctrine of utility in "adjusting our actions so as to promote, in the greatest degree, the happiness of mankind." It is obviously difficult to apply this doctrine in practice. The welfare of mankind depends upon circumstances which, if it were possible, it is not easy to foresee. Indeed in many of those conjunctures in which important decisions must instantly be made, the computation of tendencies to general happiness is wholly impracticable.

Besides these objections which apply to the systems separately, there is one which applies to them all—That they do not refer us directly to the will of God. They interpose a medium ; and it is the inevitable tendency of all such mediums to render the truth uncertain. They depend not indeed upon hearsay evidence, but upon something of which the tendency is the same. They seek the will of God not from positive evidence but by implication ; and we repeat the truth, that every medium that is interposed between the Divine will and our estimates of it, diminishes the probability that we shall estimate it rightly.

These are considerations which, antecedently to all others, would prompt us to seek the will of God directly and immediately ; and it is evident that this direct and immediate knowledge of the Divine will, can in no other manner be possessed than by his own communication of it.

THE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD.

That a direct communication of the will of the Deity respecting the conduct which mankind shall pursue, must be very useful to them, can need little proof. It is sufficiently obvious that they who have had no access to the written revelations, have commonly entertained very imperfect views of right and wrong. What Dr. Johnson says of the ancient epic poets, will apply generally to pagan philosophers : They "were very unskilful teachers of virtue," because "they wanted the light of revelation." Yet these men were inquisitive and acute, and it may be supposed they would have discovered moral truth if sagacity and inquisitiveness had been sufficient for the task. But it is unquestionable, that there are many plowmen in this country who possess more accurate knowledge of morality than all the sages of antiquity. We do not indeed sufficiently consider for how much knowledge respecting the Divine will we are indebted to his own communication of it. "Many arguments, many truths, both moral and religious, which appear to us the products of our understandings and the fruits of ratiocination, are in reality nothing more than emanations from Scripture; rays of the gospel imperceptibly transmitted, and as it were conveyed to our minds in a side light.* Of Lord Herbert's book, De Veritate, which was designed to disprove the validity of revelation, it is observed by the editor of his "Life," that it is "a book so strongly imbued with the light of revelation relative to the moral virtues and a future life, that no man ignorant of the Scriptures or of the knowledge derived from them, could have written it."† A modern system of moral philosophy is founded upon the duty of doing good to man, because it appears, from benevolence of God himself, that such is His will. Did those philosophers then, who had no access to the written expression of his will, discover with any distinctness this seemingly obvious benevolence of God? No. "The heathens failed of drawing that deduction relating to morality, to which, as we should now judge, the most obvious parts of natural knowledge, and such as certainly obtained among them, were sufficient to lead them, namely, the *Balguy. Tracts Moral and Theological :—Second letter to a Deist.

† 4th Ed., p. 336.

the goodness of God."†—We are, I say, much more indebted to revelation for moral light, than we commonly acknowledge or indeed commonly perceive.

But if in fact we obtain from the communication of the will of God, knowledge of wider extent and of a higher order than was otherwise attainable, is it not an argument that the communicated will should be our supreme law, and that, if any of the inferior means of acquiring moral knowledge lead to conclusions in opposition to that will, they ought to give way to its higher authority?

Indeed the single circumstance that an Omniscient Being, and who also is the Judge of mankind, has expressed his will respecting their conduct, appears a sufficient evidence that they should regard that expression as their paramount rule. They cannot elsewhere refer to so high an authority. If the expression of his will is not the ultimate standard of right and wrong, it can only be on the supposition that his will itself is not the ultimate standard; for no other means of ascertaining that will can be equally perfect and authoritative.

Another consideration is this, that if we examine those sacred volumes in which the written expression of the Divine will is contained, we find that they habitually proceed upon the supposition that the will of God being expressed, is for that reason our final law. They do not set about formal proofs that we ought to sacrifice inferior rules to it, but conclude, as of course, that if the will of God is made known, human duty is ascertained. It is not to be imagined that the Scriptures would refer to any other foundation of virtue than the true one, and certain it is that the foundation to which they constantly do refer is the will of God." ‡

† Pearson : Remarks on the Theory of Morals.

‡ Pearson : Theory of Mor. c. I.

Nor is this all : they refer to the expression of the will of God. We hear nothing of any other ultimate authority—nothing of “sympathy”—nothing of the “eternal fitness of things”—nothing of the “production of the greatest sum of enjoyment;”—but we hear, repeatedly, constantly, of the will of God ; of the voice of God ; of the commands of God. To be obedient unto his voice,”* is the condition of favor. To hear the “sayings of Christ and do them,”† is the means of obtaining his approbation. To “fear God and keep his commandments, is the whole duty of man.”‡ Even superior intelligences are described as “doing his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word.”§ In short, the whole system of moral legislation, as it is exhibited in Scripture, is a system founded upon authority. The propriety, the utility of the requisitions are not made of importance. That which is made of importance is, the authority of the Being who legislates. “Thus saith the Lord,” is regarded as constituting a sufficient and a final law. So also it is with the moral instructions of Christ. “He put the truth of what he taught upon authority.” || In the sermon on the mount, I say unto you, is proposed as the sole, and sufficient, and ultimate ground of obligation. He does not say, My precepts will promote human happiness, therefore you are to obey them : but he says, They are my precepts, therefore you are to obey them. So habitually is this principle borne in mind, if we may so speak, by those who were commissioned to communicate the Divine will, that the reason of a precept is not often assigned. The assumption evidently was, that the Divine will was all that it was necessary for us to know. This is not the mode of enforcing duties which one man usually adopts in

*Deut. iv. 30.

†Matt. vii. 24.

‡Eccl. xii. 13.

§Pa. ciii. 20.

||Paley : Evid. of Chris. p. 2, c. 2.

addressing another. He discusses the reasonableness of his advices and the advantages of following them, as well as, perhaps, the authority from which he derives them. The difference that exists between such a mode and that which is actually adopted in Scripture, is analogous to that which exists between the mode in which a parent communicates his instructions to a young child, and that which is employed by a tutor to an intelligent youth. The tutor recommends his instructions by their reasonableness and propriety : the father founds his upon his own authority. Not that the father's instructions are not also founded in propriety, but that this, in respect of young children, is not the ground upon which he expects their obedience. It is not the ground upon which God expects the obedience of man. We can, undoubtedly, in general perceive the wisdom of his laws, and it is doubtless right to seek out that wisdom ; but whether we discover it or not, does not lessen their authority nor alter our duties.

In deference to these reasonings, then, we conclude that the communicated will of God is the Final Standard of Right and Wrong—that wheresoever this will is made known, human duty is determined—and that neither the conclusions of philosophers, nor advantages, nor dangers, nor pleasures, nor sufferings, ought to have any opposing influence in regulating our conduct. Let it be remembered that in morals there can be no equilibrium of authority. If the expressed will of the Deity is not our supreme rule, some other is superior. This fatal consequence is inseparable from the adoption of any other ultimate rule of conduct. The Divine law becomes the decision of a certain tribunal—the adopted rule, the decision of a superior tribunal—for that must needs be the superior which can reverse the decisions of the other. It is a consideration, too, which may reasonably alarm the enquirer, that if once we assume this power of dispensing with the Divine law, there is no limit to its exercise. If we may supersede one precept of the Deity upon one occasion, we may supersede every precept upon all occasions. Man becomes the greater authority, and God the less.

If a proposition is proved to be true, no contrary reasonings can show it to be false; and yet it is necessary to refer to such reasonings, not indeed for the sake of the truth, but for the sake of those whose conduct it should regulate. Their confidence in truth may be increased if they discover that the reasonings which assail it are fallacious. To a considerate man it will be no subject of wonder that the supremacy of the expressed will of God is often not recognized in the writings of moralists or in the practice of life. The speculative enquirer finds, that of some of the questions which come before him, Scripture furnishes no solution, and he seeks for some principle by which all may be solved. This indeed is the ordinary course of those who erect systems, whether in morals or in physics. The moralist acknowledges, perhaps, the authority of revelation; but in his investigations he passes away from the precepts of revelation to some of those subordinate means by which human duties may be discovered,—means which, however authorized by the Deity as subservient to his great purpose of human instruction, are wholly unauthorized as ultimate standards of right and wrong. Having fixed his attention upon these subsidiary means, he practically loses sight of the Divine law which he acknowledges: and thus without any formal, perhaps without any conscious, rejection of the expressed will of God, he really makes it subordinate to inferior rules. Another influential motive to pass by the Divine precepts, operates both upon writers and upon the public:—the rein which they hold upon the desires and passions of mankind, is more tight than they are willing to bear. Respecting some of these precepts we feel as the rich man of old felt : we hear the injunction and go away, if not with sorrow yet without obedience. Here again is an obvious motive to the writer to endeavor to substitute some less rigid rule of conduct, and an obvious motive to the reader to acquiesce in it as true without a very rigid scrutiny into its foundation. To adhere with fidelity to the expressed will of heaven, requires greater confidence in God than most men are willing to repose, or than most moralists are willing to recommend.

But whatever have been the causes, the fact is indisputable, that few or none of the systems of morality which have been offered to the world, have uniformly and consistently applied the communicated will of God in determination of those questions to which it is applicable. Some insist upon its supreme authority in general terms ; others apply it in determining some questions of rectitude : but where is the work that applies it always ? Where is the moralist who holds everything, ease, interest, reputation, expediency, "honor,"—personal and national,—in subordination to this moral law ?

One source of ambiguity and of error in moral philosophy, has consisted in the indeterminate use of the term, "the will of God." It is used without reference to the mode by which that will is to be discovered—and it is in this mode that the essence of the controversy lies. We are agreed that the will of God is to be our rule: the question at issue is, What mode of discovering it should be primarily adopted ? Now the term, the "will of God," has been applied, interchangeably, to the precepts of Scripture, and to the deductions which have been made from other principles. The consequence has been that the imposing sanction, "the will of God," has been applied to propositions of very different authority.

To inquire into the validity of all those principles which have been proposed as the standard of rectitude, would be foreign to the purpose of this essay. That principle which appears to be most recommended by its own excellence and beauty, and which obtains the greatest share of approbation in the world, is the principle of directing "every action so as to produce the greatest happiness and the least misery in our power." The particular forms of defining the doctrine are various, but they may be conveniently included in the one general term—Expediency.

We say that the apparent beauty and excellence of this rule of action are so captivating, its actual acceptance in the world is so great, and the reasonings by which it is supported are so acute, that if it can be shown that this rule is not the ultimate standard of right and wrong, we may safely conclude that none other which philosophy has proposed can make pretensions to such authority. The truth indeed is, that the objections to the doctrine of expediency will generally be found to apply to every doctrine which lays claim to moral supremacy—which application the reader is requested to make for himself as he passes along.

Respecting the principle of expediency—the doctrine that we should, in every action, endeavor to produce the greatest sum of human happiness—let it always be remembered that the only question is, whether it ought to be the paramount rule of human conduct. No one doubts whether it ought to influence us, or whether it is of great importance in estimating the duties of morality. The sole question is this :—When an expression of the will of God, and our calculations respecting human happiness, lead to different conclusions respecting the rectitude of an action—whether of the two shall we prefer and obey ?

We are concerned only with Christian writers. Now, when we come to analyze the principles of the Christian advocates of expediency, we find precisely the result which we should expect—a perpetual vacillation between two irreconcilable doctrines. As Christians, they necessarily acknowledge the authority, and in words at least, the supreme authority of the Divine law: as advocates of the universal application of the law of expediency, they necessarily sometimes set aside the Divine law, because they sometimes cannot deduce, from both laws, the same rule of action. Thus there is induced a continual fluctuation and uncertainty both in principles and in practical rules: a continual endeavor to “serve two masters.”

The high language of Dr. Paley respecting expediency as a paramount law, is well known:—“Whatever is expedient is right.” *—“The obligation of every law depends upon its ultimate utility.” †—“It is the utility of any moral rule alone which constitutes the obligation of it.” ‡ Perjury, robbery and murder, “are not useful, and for that reason, and that reason only, are not right.” § It is obvious that this language affirms that utility is a higher authority than the expressed will of God. If the utility of a moral rule alone constitutes the obligation of it, then is its obligation not constituted by the divine command. If murder is wrong only because it is not useful, it is not wrong because God has said, “Thou shalt not kill.”

But Paley was a Christian, and therefore could neither formally displace the Scripture precepts from their station of supremacy, nor avoid formally acknowledging that they were supreme. Accordingly he says, “There are two methods of coming at the will of God on any point: First—By his express declarations, when they are to be had, and which must be sought for in Scripture.”* Secondly—by Expediency. And again, when Scripture precepts “are clear and positive, there is an end to all further deliberation.”† This makes the expressed will of God the final standard of right and wrong. And here is the vacillation, the attempt to serve two masters of which we speak: for this elevation of the express declarations of God to the supremacy, is also absolutely incompatible with the doctrines that are quoted in the preceding paragraph.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. B. 2, c. 6. † B. 6, c. 12. ‡ B. 2, c. 6.

§ B. 2, c. 6.

Perhaps the reader will say that these inconsistencies, however they may impeach the skilfulness of the writer, do not prove that his system is unsound, or that Utility is not still the ultimate standard of rectitude. We answer, that to a Christian writer such inconsistencies are unavoidable. He is obliged, in conformity with the principles of his religion, to acknowledge the divine, and therefore the supreme authority of Scripture; and if, in addition to this, he assumes that any other is supreme, inconsistency must ensue. For the same consequence follows the adoption of any other ultimate standard—whether sympathy, or right reason, or eternal fitness, or nature. If the writer is a Christian he cannot, without falling into inconsistencies, assert the supremacy of any of these principles: that is to say, when the precepts of Scripture dictate one action, and a reasoning from his principle dictates another, he must make his election: If he prefers his principle, Christianity is abandoned: if he prefers Scripture, his principle is subordinate: if he alternately prefers the one and the other, he falls into the vacillation and inconsistency of which we speak.

Bearing still in mind that the rule “to endeavor to produce the greatest happiness in our power,” is objectionable only when it is made an ultimate rule, the reader is invited to attend to these short considerations.

* B. 2, c. 4.

† B. 2, c. 4: Note.

I. In computing human happiness, the advocate of expediency does not sufficiently take into the account our happiness in futurity. Nor indeed does he always take it into account at all. One definition says, "The test of the morality of an act is its tendency to promote the temporal advantage of the greatest number in the society to which we belong." Now many things may be very expedient if death were annihilation, which may be very inexpedient now : and therefore it is not unreasonable to expect, nor an unreasonable exercise of humility to act upon the expectation, that the divine laws may sometimes impose obligations of which we do not perceive the expediency or the use. "It may so fall out," says Hooker, "that the reason why some laws of God were given, is neither opened nor possible to be gathered by the wit of man."* And Pearson says, "There are many parts of morality, as taught by revelation, which are entirely independent of an accurate knowledge of nature."† And Gisborne, "Our experience of God's dispensations by no means permits us to affirm, that he always thinks fit to act in such a manner as is productive of particular expediency ; much less to conclude that he wills us always to act in such a manner as we suppose would be productive of it."‡ All this sufficiently indicates that expediency is wholly inadmissible as an ultimate rule.

II. The doctrine is altogether unconnected with the Christian revelation, or with any revelation from heaven. It was just as true, and the deductions from it just as obligatory, two or five thousand years ago as now. The alleged supreme law of morality—"Whatever is expedient is right"—might have been taught by Epictetus as well as by a modern Christian. But are we then to be told that the revelations from the Deity have conveyed no moral knowledge to man? that they make no act obligatory which was not obligatory before? that he who had the fortune to discover that "whatever is expedient is right," possessed a moral law just as perfect as that which God has ushered into the world, and much more comprehensive?

* Eccles. Polity, B. 3, s. 10. † Theory of Morals : c. 3.

‡ Principles of Mor. Phil.

III. If some subordinate rule of conduct were proposed—some principle which served as an auxiliary moral guide—I should not think it a valid objection to its truth, to be told that no sanction of the principle was to be found in the written revelation: but if some rule of conduct were proposed as being of universal obligation, some moral principle which was paramount to every other—and I discovered that this principle was unsanctioned by the written revelation, I should think this want of sanction was conclusive evidence against it: because it is not credible that a revelation from God, of which one great object was to teach mankind the moral law of God, would have been silent respecting a rule of conduct which was to be an universal guide to man. We apply these considerations to the doctrine of expediency: Scripture contains not a word upon the subject.

IV. The principles of expediency necessarily proceed upon the supposition that we are to investigate the future, and this investigation is, as every one knows, peculiarly without the limits of human sagacity: an objection which derives additional force from the circumstance that an action, in order to be expedient, "must be expedient on the whole, at the long run, in all its effects, collateral and remote."* I do not know whether, if a man should sit down expressly to devise a moral principle which should be uncertain and difficult in its application, he could devise one that would be more difficult and uncertain than this. So that, as Dr. Paley himself acknowledges, "It is impossible to ascertain every duty by an immediate reference to public utility."* The reader may therefore conclude with Dr. Johnson, that "by presuming to determine what is fit and what is beneficial, they presuppose more knowledge of the universal system than man has attained, and therefore depend upon principles too complicated and extensive for our comprehension : and there can be no security in the consequence when the premises are not understood."†

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. B. 2, c. 8.

V. But whatever may be the propriety of investigating all consequences "collateral and remote," it is certain that such an investigation is possible only in that class of moral questions which allows a man time to sit down and deliberately to think and compute. As it respects that large class of cases in which a person must decide and act in a moment, it is wholly useless. There are thousands of conjunctures in life in which a man can no more stop to calculate effects collateral and remote, than he can stop to cross the Atlantic : and it is difficult to conceive that any rule of morality can be absolute and universal, which is totally inapplicable to so large a portion of human affairs.

VI. Lastly, the rule of expediency is deficient in one of the first requisites of a moral law—obviousness and palpability of sanction. What is the process by which the sanction is applied? Its advocates say, the Deity is a benevolent Being : as he is benevolent himself, it is reasonable to conclude he wills that his creatures should be benevolent to one another : this benevolence is to be exercised by adapting every action to the promotion of the "universal interest" of man : "Whatever is expedient is right : " or, God wills that we should consult expediency.—Now we say that there are so many considerations placed between the rule and the act, that the practical authority of the rule is greatly diminished. It is easy to perceive that the authority of a rule will not come home to that man's mind, who is told, respecting a given action, that its effects upon the universal interest is the only thing that makes it right or wrong. All the doubts that arise as to this effect are so many diminutions of the sanction. It is like putting half a dozen new contingencies between the act of thieving and the conviction of a jury; and every one knows that the want of certainty of penalty is a great encouragement to offences. The principle too is liable to the most extravagant abuse—or rather extravagant abuse is, in the present condition of mankind, inseparable from its general adoption. "Whatever is expedient is right," soliloquizes the moonlight adventurer into the poultry-yard: "It will tend more to the sum of human happiness that my wife and I should dine on a capon, than that the farmer should feel the satisfaction of possessing it;"—and so he mounts the hen-roost. I do not say that this hungry moralist would reason soundly, but I say that he would not listen to the philosophy which replied, "Oh, your reasoning is incomplete: you must take into account all consequences collateral and remote; and then you will find that it is more expedient, upon the whole and at the long run, that you and your wife should be hungry, than that hen-roosts should be insecure."

† B. 6, c. 12.

† Western Isles.

It is happy, however, that this principle never can be generally applied to the private duties of man. Its abuses would be so enormous that the laws would take, as they do in fact take, better measures for regulating men's conduct than this doctrine supplies. And happily too, the Universal Lawgiver has not left mankind without more distinct and more influential perceptions of his will and his authority, than they could ever derive from the principles of expediency.

---

But an objection has probably presented itself to the reader, that the greater part of mankind have no access to the written expression of the will of God : and how, it may be asked, can that be the final standard of right and wrong for the human race, of which the majority of the race have never heard ? The question is reasonable and fair.

We answer then, first, that supposing most men to be destitute of a communication of the Divine will, it does not affect the obligations of those who do possess it. That communication is the final law to me, whether my African brother enjoys it or not. Every reason by which the supreme authority of the law is proved, is just as applicable to those who do enjoy the communication of it, whether that communication is enjoyed by many or by few ; and this, so far as the argument is concerned, appears to be a sufficient answer. If any man has no direct access to his Creator's will, let him have recourse to "eternal fitnesses," or to "expediency ;" but his condition does not affect that of another man who does possess this access.

But our real reply to the objection is, that they who are destitute of Scripture, are not destitute of a direct communication of the will of God. The proof of this position must be deferred to a subsequent chapter ; and the reader is solicited for the present, to allow us to assume its truth. This direct communication may be limited, it may be incomplete, but some communication exists ; enough to assure them that some things are acceptable to the Supreme Power, and that some are not ; enough to indicate a distinction between right and wrong ; enough to make them moral agents, and reasonably accountable to our common Judge. If these principles are true, and especially if the amount of the communication is in many cases considerable, it is obvious that it will be of great value in the direction of individual conduct. We say of individual conduct, because it is easy to perceive that it would not often subserve the purposes of him who frames public rules of morality. A person may possess a satisfactory assurance in his own mind, that a given action is inconsistent with the Divine will, but that assurance is not conveyed to another, unless he participates in the evidence upon which it is founded. That which is wanted in order to supply public rules for human conduct, is a publicly avouched authority ; so that a writer, in deducing those rules, has to apply, ultimately, to that standard which God has publicly sanctioned.

---

CHAPTER III.

SUBORDINATE STANDARDS OF RIGHT AND WRONG.

Foundation and limits of the authority of subordinate moral rules.

The written expression of the Divine will does not contain, and no writings can contain, directions for our conduct in every circumstance of life. If the precepts of Scripture were multiplied a hundred or a thousand fold, there would still arise a multiplicity of questions to which none of them would specifically apply. Accordingly, there are some subordinate authorities, to which, as can be satisfactorily shown, it is the will of God that we should refer. He who does refer to them and regulate his conduct by them, conforms to the will of God.

To a son who is obliged to regulate all his actions by his father's will, there are two ways in which he may practice obedience—one, by receiving, upon each subject, his father's direct instructions ; and the other by receiving instructions from those whom his father commissions to teach him. The parent may appoint a governor, and enjoin, that upon all questions of a certain kind the son shall conform to his instructions ; and if the son does this, he as truly and really performs his father's will, and as strictly makes that will the guide of his conduct, as if he received the instructions immediately from his parent. But if the father have laid down certain general rules for his son's observance, as that he shall devote ten hours a day to study, and not less—although the governor should recommend or even command him to devote fewer hours, he may not comply ; for if he does, the governor, and not his father, is his supreme guide. The subordination is destroyed.

This case illustrates, perhaps, with sufficient precision, the situation of mankind with respect to moral rules. Our Creator has given direct laws, some general and some specific. These are of final authority. But he has also sanctioned, or permitted an application to, other rules ; and in conforming to these, so long as we hold them in subordination to his laws we perform his will.

Of these subordinate rules it were possible to enumerate many. Perhaps, indeed, few principles have been proposed as "The fundamental Rules of Virtue," which may not rightly be brought into use by the Christian in regulating his conduct in life : for the objection to many of these principles is, not so much that they are useless, as that they are unwarranted as paramount laws. "Sympathy" may be of use, and "Nature" may be of use, and "Self-love," and "Benevolence ;" and to those who know what it means, "Eternal fitnesses too."

Some of the subordinate rules of conduct it will be proper hereafter to notice, in order to discover, if we can, how far their authority extends, and where it ceases. The observations that we shall have to offer upon them may conveniently be made under these heads: The Law of the Land, The Law of Nature, The Promotion of Human Happiness or Expediency, The Law of Nations, The Law of Honor.

These observations will, however, necessarily be preceded by an enquiry into the great principles of human duty as they are delivered in Scripture, and into the reality of that communication of the Divine will to the mind, which the reader has been requested to allow us to assume.

---

CHAPTER IV.

COLLATERAL OBSERVATIONS.

The reader is requested to regard the present chapter as parenthetical. The parenthesis is inserted here, because the writer does not know where more appropriately to place it.

---

IDENTICAL AUTHORITY OF MORAL AND RELIGIOUS OBLIGATIONS.

Identical authority of moral and religious obligations—The Divine attributes—Of deducing rules of human duty from a consideration of the attributes of God—Virtue: "Virtue is conformity with the standard of rectitude"—Motives of action.

This identity is a truth to which we do not sufficiently advert either in our habitual sentiments or in our practice. There are many persons who speak of religious duties, as if there was something sacred or imperative in their obligation that does not belong to duties of morality—many, who would perhaps offer up their lives rather than profess a belief in a false religious dogma, but who would scarcely sacrifice an hour's gratification rather than violate the moral law of love. It is therefore of importance to remember that the authority which imposes moral obligations and religious obligations is one and the same—the will of God. Fidelity to God is just as truly violated by a neglect of his moral laws, as by a compromise of religious principles. Religion and Morality are abstract terms, employed to indicate different classes of those duties which the Deity has imposed upon mankind ; but they are all imposed by Him, and all are enforced by equal authority. Not indeed that the violation of every particular portion of the Divine will involves equal guilt, but that each violation is equally a disregard of the Divine authority. Whether, therefore, fidelity be required to a point of doctrine or practice, to theology or to morals, the obligation is the same. It is the Divine requisition which constitutes this obligation, and not the nature of the duty required ; so that, whilst I think a Protestant does no more than his duty when he prefers death to a profession of the Roman Catholic faith, I think also that every Christian who believes that Christ has prohibited swearing, does no more than his duty when he prefers death to taking an oath.

I would especially solicit the reader to bear in mind this principle of the identity of the authority of moral and religious obligations, because he may otherwise imagine that, in some of the subsequent pages, the obligation of a moral law is too strenuously insisted on, and that fidelity to it is to be purchased at "too great a sacrifice" of ease and enjoyment.

THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

The purpose for which a reference is here made to these sacred subjects, is to remark upon the unfitness of attempting to deduce human duties from the attributes of God. It is not indeed to be affirmed that no illustration of those duties can be derived from them, but that they are too imperfectly cognizable by our perceptions to enable us to refer to them for specific moral rules. The truth indeed is, that we do not accurately and distinctly know what the Divine attributes are. We say that God is merciful; but if we attempt to define, with strictness, what the term merciful means, we shall find it a difficult, perhaps an impracticable task; and especially we shall have a difficult task if, after the definition, we attempt to reconcile every appearance which presents itself in the world, with our notions of the attribute of mercy. I would speak with reverence when I say that we cannot always perceive the mercifulness of the Deity in his administrations, either towards his rational or his irrational creation. So, again, in respect of the attribute of Justice, who can determinately define in what this attribute consists? Who, especially, can prove that the Almighty designs that we should always be able to trace his justice in his government? We believe that he is unchangeable; but what is the sense in which we understand the term? Do we mean that the attribute involves the necessity of an unchanging system of moral government, or that the Deity cannot make alterations in, or additions to, his laws for mankind? We cannot mean this, for the evidence of revelation disproves it.

Now, if it be true that the Divine attributes, and the uniform accordancy of the Divine dispensations with our notions of those attributes, are not sufficiently within our powers of investigation to enable us to frame accurate premises for our reasoning, it is plain that we cannot always trust with safety to our conclusions. We cannot deduce rules for our conduct from the Divine attributes without being very liable to error ; and the liability will increase in proportion as the deduction attempts critical accuracy.

Yet this is a rock upon which the judgments of many have suffered wreck, a quicksand where many have been involved in inextricable difficulties. One, because he cannot reconcile the commands to exterminate a people with his notions of the attribute of mercy, questions the truth of the Mosaic writings. One, because he finds wars permitted by the Almighty of old, concludes that, as he is unchangeable, they cannot be incompatible with his present or his future will. One, on the supposition of this unchangeableness, perplexes himself because the dispensations of God and his laws have been changed ; and vainly labors, by classifying these laws into those which result from his attributes, and those which do not, to vindicate the immutability of God. We have no business with these things, and I will venture to affirm that he who will take nothing upon trust—who will exercise no faith—who will believe in the divine authority of no rule, and in the truth of no record, which he is unable to reconcile with the Divine attributes—must be consigned to hopeless Pyrrhonism.

The lesson which such considerations teach is a simple but an important one : That our exclusive business is to discover the actual present will of God, without enquiring why his will is such as it is, or why it has ever been different ; and without seeking to deduce, from our notions of the Divine attributes, rules of conduct which are more safely and more certainly discovered by other means.

VIRTUE.

The definitions which have been proposed of virtue have necessarily been both numerous and various, because many and discordant standards of rectitude have been advanced; and virtue must, in every man's system, essentially consist in conforming the conduct to the standard which he thinks is the true one. This must be true of those systems, at least, which make virtue consist in doing right.—Adam Smith indeed says, that “Virtue is excellence; something uncommonly great and beautiful, which rises far above what is vulgar and ordinary.”* By which it would appear that virtue is a relative quality, depending not upon some perfect or permanent standard, but upon the existing practice of mankind. Thus the action which possessed no virtue amongst a good community, might possess much in a bad one. The practice which “rose far above” the ordinary practice of one nation, might be quite common in another: and if mankind should become much worse than they are now, that conduct would be eminently virtuous amongst them which now is not virtuous at all. That such a definition of virtue is likely to lead to very imperfect practice is plain; for what is the probability that a man will attain to that standard which God proposes, if his utmost estimate of virtue rises no higher than to an indeterminate superiority over other men?

Our definition of virtue necessarily accords with the principles of morality which have been advanced in the preceding chapter: Virtue is conformity with the Standard of Rectitude; which standard consists, primarily, in the expressed will of God.

Virtue, as it respects the meritoriousness of the agent, is another consideration. The quality of an action is one thing, the desert of the agent is another. The business of him who illustrates moral rules, is not with the agent, but with the act. He must state what the moral law pronounces to be right and wrong : but it is very possible that an individual may do what is right without any virtue, because there may be no rectitude in his motives and intentions. He does a virtuous act, but he is not a virtuous agent.

* Theo. Mor. Sent.

Although the concern of a work like the present is evidently with the moral character of actions, without reference to the motives of the agent ; yet the remark may be allowed, that there is frequently a sort of inaccuracy and unreasonableness in the judgments which we form of the deserts of other men. We regard the act too much, and the intention too little. The footpad who discharges a pistol at a traveller and fails in his aim, is just as wicked as if he had killed him ; yet we do not feel the same degree of indignation at his crime. So, too, of a person who does good. A man who plunges into a river and saves a child from drowning, impresses the parents with a stronger sense of his deserts than if, with the same exertions, he had failed. —We should endeavor to correct this inequality of judgment, and in forming our estimates of human conduct, should refer, much more than we commonly do, to what the agent intends. It should habitually be borne in mind, and especially with reference to our own conduct, that to have been unable to execute an ill intention deducts nothing from our guilt ; and that at that tribunal where intention and action will be both regarded, it will avail little if we can only say that we have done no evil. Nor let it be less remembered, with respect to those who desire to do good but have not the power, that their virtue is not diminished by their want of ability. I ought, perhaps, to be as grateful to the man who feelingly commiserates my sufferings but cannot relieve them, as to him who sends me money or a physician. The mite of the widow of old was estimated even more highly than the greater offerings of the rich.

---

CHAPTER V.

SCRIPTURE.

The morality of the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations—Their moral requisitions not always coincident—Supremacy of the Christian morality—Of variations in the Moral Law—Mode of applying the precepts of Scripture to the questions of duty—No formal moral system in Scripture—Criticism of Biblical morality—Of particular precepts and general rules—Matt. vii. 12.—I Cor. x. 31.—Rom. iii. 8.—Benevolence, as it is proposed in the Christian Scriptures.

THE MORALITY OF THE PATRIARCHAL, MOSAIC AND CHRISTIAN DISPENSATIONS.

One of the very interesting considerations which are presented to an enquirer in perusing the volume of Scripture, consists in the variations in its morality. There are three distinctly defined periods, in which the moral government and laws of the Deity assume, in some respects, a different character. In the first, without any system of external instruction, he communicated his will to some of our race, either immediately or through a superhuman messenger. In the second, he promulgated, through Moses, a distinct and extended code of laws, addressed peculiarly to a selected people. In the third, Jesus Christ and his commissioned ministers, delivered precepts, of which the general character was that of greater purity or perfection, and of which the obligation was universal upon mankind.

That the records of all these dispensations contain declarations of the will of God, is certain : that their moral requisitions are not always coincident, is also certain ; and hence the conclusion becomes inevitable, that to us, one is of primary authority ;—that when all do not coincide, one is paramount to the others. That a coincidence does not always exist, may easily be shown. It is manifest, not only by a comparison of precepts and of the general tenor of the respective records, but from the express declarations of Christianity itself.

One example, referring to the Christian and Jewish dispensations, may be found in the extension of the law of Love. Christianity, in extending the application of this law, requires us to abstain from that which the law of Moses permitted us to do. Thus it is in the instance of duties to our “neighbor,” as they are illustrated in the parable of the Samaritan.* Thus too, in the sermon on the mount : “It hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies.”† It is indeed sometimes urged that the words “hate thine enemy,” were only a gloss of the expounders of the law : but Grotius writes thus—“What is there repeated as said to those of old, are not the words of the teachers of the law, but of Moses ; either literally or in their meaning. They are cited by our Saviour as his express words, not as interpretations of them.”‡ If the authority of Grotius should not satisfy the reader, let him consider such passages as this : “An Ammonite or a Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord. Because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt. Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever.”§ This is not coincident

* Luke x. 30.

† Rights of War and Peace.

‡ Matt. v. 43.

§ Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 6.

with, “Love your enemies;” or with, “Do good to them that hate you;” or with that temper which is recommended by the words, “to him that smiteth thee on one cheek, turn the other also.”*

“Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not on thy name,” †—is not coincident with the reproof of Christ to those who, upon similar grounds, would have called down fire from heaven. || “The Lord look upon it and require it,” †—is not coincident with, “Lord, lay not this sin to their charge.” § “Let me see thy vengeance on them,” §§—“Bring upon them the day of evil, and destroy them with double destruction,” ¶—is not coincident with “Forgive them, for they know not what they do.”**

Similar observations apply to swearing, to polygamy, to retaliation, to the motives of murder and adultery.

And as to the express assertion of the want of coincidence:—“The law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did.” †† “There is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.” †† If the commandment now existing is not weak and unprofitable, it must be because it is superior to that which existed before.

But although this appears to be thus clear with respect to the Jewish dispensation, there are some who regard the moral precepts which were delivered before the period of that dispensation, as imposing permanent obligations: they were delivered, it is said, not to one peculiar people, but to individuals of many; and, in the persons of the immediate survivors of the deluge,

* Matt. v. 39. † Jer. x. 25. || Luke, ix. 54.

† 2 Chron. xxiv. 22. § Acts, vii. 60. ¶ Jer. xvii. 18.

†† Heb. vii. 18. §§ Jer. xx. 12. †† Heb. vii. 19.

** Luke, xxiii. 34.

to the whole human race. This argument assumes a ground paramount to all questions of subsequent abrogation. Now it would appear a sufficient answer to say—If the precepts of the Patriarchal and Christian dispensations are coincident, no question needs to be discussed ; if they are not, we must make an election ; and surely the Christian cannot doubt what election he should make. Could a Jew have justified himself for violating the Mosaic law, by urging the precepts delivered to the patriarchs? No. Neither then can we justify ourselves for violating the Christian law, by urging the precepts delivered to Moses.

We indeed have, if it be possible, still stronger motives. The moral law of Christianity binds us, not merely because it is the present expression of the will of God, but because it is a portion of his last dispensation to man—of that which is avowedly not only the last, but the highest and the best. We do not find in the records of Christianity that which we find in the other Scriptures, a reference to a greater and purer dispensation yet to come. It is as true of the Patriarchal as of the Mosaic institution, that “it made nothing perfect,” and that it referred us from the first, to “the bringing in of that better hope which did.” If then the question of supremacy is between a perfect and an imperfect system, who will hesitate in his decision?

There are motives of gratitude, too, and of affection, as well as of reason. The clearer exhibition which Christianity gives of the attributes of God ; its distinct disclosure of our immortal destinies ; and above all, its wonderful discovery of the love of our Universal Father, may well give to the moral law with which they are connected, an authority which may supersede every other.

These considerations are of practical importance ; for it may be observed of those who do not advert to them, that they sometimes refer indiscriminately to the Old Testament or the New, without any other guide than the apparent greater applicability of a precept in the one or the other, to their present need: and thus it happens that a rule is sometimes acted upon, less perfect than that by which it is the good pleasure of God we should now regulate our conduct.—It is a fact which the reader should especially notice, that an appeal to the Hebrew Scriptures is frequently made when the precepts of Christianity would be too rigid for our purpose. He who insists upon a pure morality, applies to the New Testament, he who desires a little more indulgence defends himself by arguments from the Old.

Of this indiscriminate reference to all the dispensations there is an extraordinary example in the newly discovered work of Milton. He appeals, I believe, almost uniformly to the precepts of all, as of equal present obligation. The consequence is what might be expected—his moral system is not consistent. Nor is it to be forgotten, that in defending what may be regarded as less pure doctrines, he refers mostly, or exclusively, to the Hebrew Scriptures. In all his disquisitions to prove the lawfulness of untruths, he does not once refer to the New Testament.* Those who have observed the prodigious multiplicity of texts which he cites in this work, will peculiarly appreciate the importance of the fact.—Again: “Hatred,” he says, “is in some cases a religious duty.”† A proposition at which the Christian may reasonably wonder. And how does Milton prove its truth? He cites from Scripture ten passages; of which eight are from the Old Testament and two from the New. The reader will be curious to know what these two are:—“If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother—he cannot be my disciple.”‡ And the rebuke to Peter: “Get thee behind me, Satan.”* The citation of such passages shows that no passages to the purpose could be found.

* Christian Doctrine, p. 660.

† P. 641.

‡ Luke xiv. 26.

It may be regarded therefore as a general rule, that none of the injunctions or permissions which formed a part of the former dispensations can be referred to as of authority to us, except so far as they are coincident with the Christian law. To our own Master we stand or fall; and our Master is Christ.—And in estimating this coincidence, it is not requisite to show that a given rule or permission of the former dispensations is specifically superseded in the New Testament. It is sufficient if it is not accordant with the general spirit; and this consideration assumes greater weight when it is connected with another which is hereafter to be noticed—that it is by the general spirit of the Christian morality that many of the duties of man are to be discovered.

Yet it is always to be remembered, that the laws which are thus superseded were, nevertheless, the laws of God. Let not the reader suppose that we would speak or feel respecting them otherwise than with that reverence which their origin demands—or that we would take any thing from their present obligation but that which is taken by the Lawgiver himself. It may indeed be observed, that in all his dispensations there is a harmony, a one pervading principle, which, without other evidence, indicates that they proceeded from the same authority. The variations are circumstantial rather than fundamental; and, after all, the great principles in which they accord, far outweigh the particular applications in which they differ. The Mosaic Dispensation was “a schoolmaster” to bring us, not merely through the medium of types and prophecies, but through its moral law, to Christ. Both the one and the other were designed as preparatives; and it was probably as true of these moral laws as of the prophecies, that the Jews did not perceive their relationship to Christianity as it was actually introduced into the world.

* Mark viii. 33.

---

Respecting the variations of the moral law, some persons greatly and very needlessly perplex themselves by indulging in such questions as these.—“If,” say they, “God be perfect and if all the dispensations are communications of His will, how happens it that they are not uniform in their requisitions? How happens it that that which was required by Infinite Knowledge at one time, was not required by Infinite Knowledge at another?” I answer—I cannot tell. And what then? Does the enquirer think this a sufficient reason for rejecting the authority of the Christian law? If inability to discover the reasons of the moral government of God be a good motive to doubt its authority, we may involve ourselves in doubts without end.—Why does a Being who is infinitely pure, permit moral evil in the world? Why does he who is perfectly benevolent permit physical suffering? Why did he suffer our first parents to fall? Why, after they had fallen, did he not immediately repair the loss? Why was the Messiah’s appearance deferred for four thousand years? Why is not the religion of the Messiah universally known and universally operative at the present day? To all these questions and to many others, no answer can be given; and the difficulty arising from them is as great, if we choose to make difficulties for ourselves, as that which arises from variations in his moral laws. Even in infidelity we shall find no rest; the objections lead us onward to atheism. He who will not believe in a Deity unless he can reconcile all the facts before his eyes with his notions of the divine attributes, must deny that a Deity exists. I talked of rest:—Alas! there is no rest in infidelity or in atheism. To disbelieve in revelation or in God, is not to escape from a belief in things which you do not comprehend, but to transfer your belief to a new class of such things. Unbelief is credulity. The infidel is more credulous than the Christian, and the atheist is the most credulous of mankind: that is, he believes important propositions upon less evidence than any other man, and in opposition to greater.

It is curious to observe the anxiety of some writers to reconcile some of the facts before us with the "moral perfections" of the Deity; and it is instructive to observe into what doctrines they are led. They tell us that all the evil and all the pain in the world, are parts of a great system of Benevolence. "The moral and physical evil observable in the system, according to men's limited views of it, are necessary parts of the great plan; all tending ultimately to produce the greatest sum of happiness upon the whole, not only with respect to the system in general, but to each individual, according to the station he occupies in it."* They affirm that God is an "allwise Being, who directs all the movements of nature, and who is determined, by his own unalterable perfections, to maintain in it at all times, the greatest possible quantity of happiness."† The Creator found, therefore, that to inflict the misery which now exists, was the best means of promoting this happiness—that to have abated the evil, the suffering, or the misery, would be to have diminished the sum of felicity—and that men could not have been better or more at ease than they are, without making them on the whole more vicious or unhappy!—These things are beacons which should warn us. These speculations show that not only religion, but reason, dictates the propriety of acquiescing in that degree of ignorance in which it has pleased God to leave us; because they show, that attempts to acquire knowledge may conduct us to folly. These are subjects upon which he acts most rationally, who says to his reason—be still.

* This is given as the belief of Dr. Priestly. See Memoirs: Ap. No. 5.

† Adam Smith: Theory of Moral Sentiments. See also T. Southwood Smith's Illustrations of the Divine Government, in which unbridled license of speculation has led the writer into some instructive absurdities.

MODE OF APPLYING THE PRECEPTS OF SCRIPTURE TO QUESTIONS OF DUTY.

It is remarkable that many of these precepts, and especially those of the Christian Scriptures, are delivered, not systematically but occasionally. They are distributed through occasional discourses and occasional letters. Except in the instance of the law of Moses, the speaker or writer rarely set about a formal exposition of moral truth. The precepts were delivered as circumstances called them forth or made them needful. There is nothing like a system of morality; nor, consequently, does there exist that completeness, that distinctness in defining and accuracy in limiting, which, in a system of morality, we expect to find. Many rules are advanced in short absolute prohibitions or injunctions, without assigning any of those exceptions to their practical application, which the majority of such rules require.—The enquiry, in passing, may be permitted—Why are these things so? When it is considered what the Christian dispensation is, and what it is designed to effect upon the conduct of man, it cannot be supposed that the incompleteness of its moral precepts happened by inadvertence. The precepts of the former dispensation are much more precise; and it is scarcely to be supposed that the more perfect dispensation would have had a less precise law, unless the de-iciency were to be compensated from some other authoritative source:—which remark is offered as a reason, a priori, for expecting that, in the present dispensation, God would extend the operation of his law written in the heart.

But whatever may be thought of this, it is manifest that considerable care is requisite in the application of precepts, so delivered, to the conduct of life. To apply them in all cases literally, were to act neither reasonably nor consistently with the designs of the Lawgiver: to regard them in all cases as mere general directions, and to subject them to the unauthorized revision of man, were to deprive them of their proper character and authority as divine laws. In proposing some grounds for estimating the practical obligation of these precepts, I would be first allowed to express the conviction, that the simple fact that such a disquisition is needed, and that the moral duties are to be gathered rather by implication or general tenor than from specific and formal rules, is one indication amongst the many, that the dispensation of which these precepts form a part, stands not in words but in power: and I hope to be forgiven, even in a book of morality, if I express the conviction that none can fulfil their requisitions—that none indeed can appreciate them—without some participation in this “power.” I say he cannot appreciate them. Neither the morals nor the religion of Christianity can be adequately estimated by the man who sits down to the New Testament, with no other preparation than that which is necessary in sitting down to Euclid or Newton. There must be some preparation of heart as well as integrity of understanding—or, as the appropriate language of the volume itself would express it, it is necessary that we should become in some degree, the “sheep” of Christ before we can accurately “know his voice.”

There is one clear and distinct ground upon which we may limit the application of a precept that is couched in absolute language—the unlawfulness, in any given conjuncture, of obeying it. “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man.”* This, literally, is an unconditional command. But if we were to obey it unconditionally, we should sometimes comply with human, in opposition to divine laws. In such cases then, the obligation is clearly suspended; and this distinction, the first teachers of Christianity recognized in their own practice. When an “ordinance of man” required them to forbear the promulgation of the new religion, they refused obedience; and urged the befitting expostulation—“Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.”† So, too, with the filial relationship: “Children obey your parents in all things.”‡ But a parent may require his child to lie or steal; and therefore when a parent requires obedience in such things his authority ceases, and the obligation to obedience is taken away by the moral law itself. The precept, so far as the present ground of exception applies, is virtually this: Obey your parents in all things, unless disobedience is required by the will of God. Or the subject might be illustrated thus: The Author of Christianity reprobates those who love father or mother more than himself. The paramount love to God is to be manifested by obedience.§ So, then, we are to obey the commands of God in preference to those of our parents. “All human authority ceases at the point where obedience becomes criminal.”||

Of some precepts, it is evident that they were designed to be understood conditionally. “When thou

* 1 Pet. ii. 13.

† Acts, iv. 19.

‡ Col. iii. 20.

§ If ye love me, keep my commandments—John xiv. 15.

|| Mor. and Pol. Phil.

prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret.”¶ This precept is conditional. I doubt not that it is consistent with his will that the greater number of the supplications which man offers at his throne shall be offered in secret; yet, that the precept does not exclude the exercise of public prayer, is evident from this consideration, if from no other, that Christ and his apostles themselves practiced it.

Some precepts are figurative, and describe the spirit and temper that should govern us, rather than the particular actions that we should perform. Of this there is an example in, “Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.”* In promulgating some precepts a principle object appears to have been, to supply sanctions. Thus is the case of Civil Obedience: we are to obey because the Deity authorizes the institution of Civil Government—because the magistrate is the minister of God for good; and, accordingly, we are to obey not from considerations of necessity only, but of duty; “not only for wrath, but for conscience sake.”† One precept, if we accept it literally, would enjoin us to “hate” our parents; and this acceptance, Milton appears actually to have adopted. One would enjoin us to accumulate no property: “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth.”‡ Such rules are seldom mistaken in practice; and, it may be observed, that this is an indication of their practical wisdom, and their practical adaptation to the needs of man. It is not an easy thing to pronounce, as occasions arise, a large number of moral precepts in unconditional language and yet to secure them from the probability of even great misconstructions. Let the reader make the experiment.—Occasionally, but it is only occasionally, a sincere Christian, in his anxiety to conform to the moral law, accepts such precepts in a more literal sense than that in which they appear to have been designed to be applied. I once saw a book that endeavored to prove the unlawfulness of accumulating any property ; upon the authority, primarily, of this last quoted precept. The principle upon which the writer proceeded was just and right—that it is necessary to conform unconditionally, to the expressed will of God. The defect was in the criticism ; that is to say, in ascertaining what that will did actually require.

¶ Matt. vi. 6. * Matt. v. 41. † Rom. xiii. 5. ‡ Matt. vi. 19.

Another obviously legitimate ground of limiting the application of absolute precepts, is afforded us in just biblical criticism. Not that critical disquisitions are often necessary to the upright man who seeks for the knowledge of his duties. God has not left the knowledge of his moral law so remote from the sincere seekers of his will. But in deducing public rules as authoritative upon mankind, it is needful to take into account those considerations which criticism supplies. The construction of the original languages and their peculiar phraseology, the habits, manners, and prevailing opinions of the times, and the circumstances under which a precept was delivered, are evidently amongst these considerations. And literary criticism is so much the more needed, because the great majority of mankind have access to Scripture only through the medium of translations.

But in applying all these limitations to the absolute precepts of Scripture, it is to be remembered that we are not subjecting their authority to inferior principles. We are not violating the principle upon which these essays proceed, that the expression of the Divine will is our ultimate law. We are only ascertaining what that expression is. If, after just and authorized examination, any precept should still appear to stand imperative in its absolute form, we accept it as obligatory in that form. Many such precepts there are ; and being such, we allow no considerations of convenience, nor of expediency, nor considerations of any other kind, to dispense with their authority.

One great use of such inquiries as these, is to vindicate to the apprehensions of men the authority of the precepts themselves. It is very likely to happen, and to some negligent enquirers it does happen, that seeing a precept couched in unconditional language, which yet cannot be unconditionally obeyed, they call in question its general obligation. Their minds fix upon the idea of some consequences which would result from a literal obedience, and feeling assured that those consequences ought not to be undertaken, they set aside the precept itself. They are at little pains to enquire what the proper requisitions of the precept are—glad, perhaps, of a specious excuse for not regarding it at all. The careless reader, perceiving that a literal compliance with the precept to give the cloak to him who takes a coat, would be neither proper nor right, rejects the whole precept of which it forms an illustration ; and in doing this, rejects one of the most beautiful, and important, and sacred requisitions of the Christian law.*

---

There are two modes in which moral obligations are imposed in Scripture—by particular precepts, and by general rules. The one prescribes a duty upon one subject, the other upon very many. The applicability of general rules is nearly similar to that of what is usually called the spirit of the gospel, the spirit of the moral law ; which spirit is of very wide embrace in its application to the purposes of life. “In estimating the value of a moral rule, we are to have regard not only to the particular duty but the general spirit ; not only to what it directs us to do, but to the character which a compliance with its direction is likely to form in us.”* In this manner, some particular precepts become, in fact, general rules; and the duty that results from these rules, from this spirit, is as obligatory as that which is imposed by a specific injunction. Christianity requires us to maintain universal benevolence towards mankind; and he who, in his conduct towards another, disregards this benevolence, is as truly and sometimes as flagrantly a violator of the moral law, as if he had transgressed the command, “Thou shalt not steal.” This doctrine is indeed recommended by a degree of utility that makes its adoption almost a necessity; because no number of specific precepts would be sufficient for the purposes of moral instruction: so that, if we were destitute of this species of general rules, we should frequently be destitute, so far as external precepts are concerned, of any. It appears by a note to the work which has just been cited, that in the Mussulman code, which proceeds upon the system of a precise rule for a precise question, there have been promulgated seventy-five thousand precepts. I regard the wide practical applicability of some of the Christian precepts as an argument of great wisdom. They impose many duties in few words; or rather, they convey a great mass of moral instruction within a sentence that all may remember and that few can mistake. “All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,”† is of greater utility in the practice of life, and is applicable to more circumstances, than a hundred rules which presented the exact decree of kindness or assistance that should be afforded in prescribed cases. The Mosaic law, rightly regarded, conveyed many clear expositions of human duty; yet the quibbling and captious scribes of old found, in the literalities of that law, more plausible grounds for evading its duties, than can be found in the precepts of the Christian Scriptures.

* Matt. v. 38.

* Evidences of Christianity: p. 2, c. 2.

† Matt. vii. 12.

---

There are a few precepts of which the application is so extensive in human affairs, that I would, in conformity with some of the preceding remarks, briefly enquire into their practical obligation. Of these, that which has just been quoted for another purpose, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,"* is perhaps cited and recommended more frequently than any other. The difficulty of applying this precept has induced some to reject it as containing a moral maxim which is not sound: but perhaps it will be found, that the deficiency is not in the rule but in the non-applicability of the cases to which it has often been applied. It is not applicable when the act which another would that we should do to him, is in itself unlawful or adverse to some other portion of the moral law. If I seize a thief in the act of picking a pocket, he undoubtedly "would" that I should let him go; and I, if our situations were exchanged, should wish it too. But I am not therefore to release him; because, since it is a Christian obligation upon the magistrate to punish offenders, the obligation descends to me to secure them for punishment. Besides, in every such case I must do as I would be done unto with respect to all parties concerned—the public as well as the thief. The precept, again, is not applicable when the desire of the second party is such as a Christian cannot lawfully indulge. An idle and profligate man asks me to give him money. It would be wrong to indulge such a man's desire, and therefore the precept does not apply.

The reader will perhaps say; that a person's duties in such cases are sufficiently obvious without the gravity of illustration. Well—but are the principles upon which the duties are ascertained thus obvious? This is the important point. In the affairs of life, many cases arise in which a person has to refer to such principles as these, and in which, if he does not apply the right principles, he will transgress the Christian law. The law appears to be in effect this, Do as you would be done unto, except in those instances in which to act otherwise is permitted by Christianity. Inferior grounds of limitation are often applied; and they are always wrong; because they always subject the moral law to suspension by inferior authorities. To do this, is to reject the authority of the Divine will, and to place this beautiful expression of that will at the mercy of every man's inclination.

* Matt. vii. 12.

“Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.”* I have heard of the members of some dinner club who had been recommended to consider this precept, and who, in their discussions over the bottle, thought perhaps that they were arguing soundly when they held language like this: “Am I, in lifting this glass to my mouth, to do it for the purpose of bringing glory to God? Is that to be my motive in buying a horse or shooting a pheasant?” From such moralists much sagacity of discrimination was not to be expected: and these questions delighted and probably convinced the club. The mistake of these persons, and perhaps of some others, is, that they misunderstand the rule. The promotion of the Divine glory is not to be the motive and purpose of all our actions, but, having actions to perform, we are so to perform them that this glory shall be advanced. The precept is in effect, Let your actions and the motives of them be such, that others shall have reason to honor

* I Cor. x. 31.

God :*—and a precept like this is a very sensitive test of the purity of our conduct. I know not whether there is a single rule of Christianity of which the use is so constant and the application so universal. To do as we would be done by, refers to relative duties ; Not to do evil that good may come, refers to particular circumstances : but, To do all things so that the Deity may be honored, refers to almost every action of a man's life. Happily the Divine glory is thus promoted by some men even in trifling affairs—almost whether they eat or drink, or whatsoever thing they do. There is, in truth, scarcely a more efficacious means of honoring the Deity, than by observing a constant Christian manner of conducting our intercourse with men. He who habitually maintains his allegiance to religion and to purity, who is moderate and chaste in all his pursuits, and who always makes the prospects of the future predominate over the temptations of the present, is one of the most efficacious recommenders of goodness—one of the most impressive “preachers of righteousness,”—and by consequence, one of the most efficient promoters of the glory of God.

By a part of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, it appears that he and his coadjutors had been reported to hold the doctrine, that it is lawful “to do evil that good may come.”†. This report he declares is slandorous ; and expresses his reprobation of those who act upon the doctrine, by the short and emphatic declaration—their condemnation is just. This is not critically a prohibition, but it is a prohibition in effect ; and the manner in which the doctrine is reprobated, induces the belief that it was so flagitious that it needed very little enquiry or thought : in the writer's mind the transition is immediate, from the idea of the doctrine to the punishment of those who adopt it.

* “Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven”—Matt. v. 16.

† Rom. iii. 8.

Now the "evil" which is thus prohibited, is, any thing and all things discordant with the Divine will ; so that the unsophisticated meaning of the rule is, that nothing which is contrary to the Christian law may be done for the sake of attaining a beneficial end. Perhaps the breach of no moral rule is productive of more mischief than of this. That "the end justifies the means," is a maxim which many, who condemn it as a maxim, adopt in their practice : and in political affairs it is not only habitually adopted, but is indirectly, if not openly, defended as right. If a senator were to object to some measure of apparent public expediency, that it was not consistent with the moral law, he would probably be laughed at as a fanatic or a fool ; yet perhaps some who are flippant with this charge of fanaticism and folly may be in perplexity for a proof. If the expressed will of God is our paramount law, no proof can be brought ; and in truth it is not often that it is candidly attempted. I have not been amongst the least diligent enquirers into the moral reasonings of men, but honest and manly reasoning against this portion of Scripture I have never found.

Of the rule, "not to do evil that good may come," Dr. Paley says, that it "is, for the most part, a salutary caution." A person might as well say that the rule "not to commit murder" is a salutary caution. There is no caution in the matter, but an imperative law. But he proceeds :—"Strictly speaking, that cannot be evil from which good comes."* Now let the reader consider :—Paul says, "You may not do evil that good may come :" Ay, but, says the philosopher, if good does come, the acts that bring it about are NOT evil. What the apostle would have said of such a reasoner, I will not trust my pen to suppose. The reader will perceive the foundation of this reasoning. It assumes that good and evil are not to be estimated by the expressions of the will of God, but by the effects of actions. The question is clearly fundamental. If expediency be the ultimate test of rectitude, Dr. Paley is right; if the expressions of the Divine will are the ultimate test, he is wrong. You must sacrifice the one authority or the other. If this will is the greater, consequences are not: if consequences are the greater, this will is not. But this question is not now to be discussed: it may however be observed that the interpretation which the rule has been thus made to bear, appears to be contradicted by the terms of the rule itself. The rule of Christianity is, evil may not be committed for the purpose of good: the rule of the philosophy is, evil may not be committed, except for the purpose of good. Are these precepts identical? Is there not a fundamental variance, an absolute contrariety between them? Christianity does not speak of evil and good as contingent, but as fixed qualities. You cannot convert the one into the other by disquisitions about expediency. In morals, there is no philosopher's stone that can convert evil into good with a touch. Our labors, so long as the authority of the moral law is acknowledged, will end like those of the physical alchymist: after all our efforts at transmutation, lead will not become gold—evil will not become good. However there is one subject of satisfaction in considering such reasonings as these. They prove, negatively, the truth which they assail; for that against which nothing but sophistry can be urged, is undoubtedly true. The simple truth is, that if evil may be done for the sake of good, all the precepts of Scripture which define or prohibit evil are laws no longer; for that cannot in any rational use of language be called a law in respect of those to whom it is directed, if they are at liberty to neglect it when they think fit. These precepts may be advices, recommendations, "salutary cautions" but they are not laws. They may suggest hints, but they do not impose duties.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 2. c. 8.

With respect to the legitimate grounds of exceptions or limitation in the application of this rule, there appear to be few or none. The only question is, What actions are evil? Which question is to be determined, ultimately, by the will of God.

BENEVOLENCE AS IT IS PROPOSED IN THE CHRISTIAN SCRIPTURES.

In enquiring into the great principles of that moral system which the Christian revelation institutes, we discover one remarkable characteristic, one pervading peculiarity by which it is distinguished from every other—the paramount emphasis which it lays upon the exercise of pure Benevolence. It will be found that this preference of "Love" is wise as it is unexampled, and that no other general principle would effect, with any approach to the same completeness, the best and highest purposes of morality. How easy soever it be for us, to whom the character and obligations of this benevolence are comparatively familiar, to perceive the wisdom of placing it at the foundation of the moral law, we are indebted for the capacity not to our own sagaciousness, but to light which has been communicated from heaven. That schoolmaster the law of Moses never taught, and the speculations of philosophy never discovered, that love was the fulfilment of the moral law. Eighteen hundred years ago this doctrine was a new commandment.

Love is made the test of the validity of our claims to the Christian character—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples.”* Again, “Love one another. He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.”† It is not therefore surprising that after an enumeration, in another place, of various duties, the same dignified apostle says, “Above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness.”‡ The inculcation of this benevolence is as frequent in the Christian Scriptures as its practical utility is great. He who would look through the volume will find that no topic is so frequently introduced, no obligations so emphatically enforced, no virtue to which the approbation of God is so specially promised. It is the theme of all the “apostolic exhortations, that with which their morality begins and ends, from which all their details and enumerations set out and into which they return.”§ “He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.”|| More emphatical language cannot be employed. It exalts to the utmost the character of the virtue, and, in effect, promises its possessor the utmost favor and felicity. If then, of faith, hope and love, love be the greatest; if it be by the test of love that our pretensions to Christianity are to be tried; if all the relative duties of morality are embraced in one word, and that word is love; it is obviously needful that, in a book like this, the requisitions of benevolence should be habitually regarded in the prosecution of its enquiries. And accordingly the reader will sometimes be invited to sacrifice inferior considerations to these

* John xiii. 35.

† Rom. xiii. 9.

‡ Col. iii. 14.

§ Evid. Christianity, p. 2. c. 2.

|| 1 John iv. 16.

requisitions, and to give to the law of love that paramount station in which it has been placed by the authority of God.

It is certain that almost every offence against the relative duties, has its origin, if not in the malevolent propensities, at least in those propensities which are incongruous with love. I know not whether it is possible to disregard any one obligation that respects the intercourse of man with man, without violating this great Christian law. This universal applicability may easily be illustrated by referring to the obligations of Justice, obligations which, in civilized communities, are called into operation more frequently than almost any other. He who estimates the obligations of justice by a reference to that benevolence which Christianity prescribes, will form to himself a much more pure and perfect standard than he who refers to the law of the land, to the apprehension of exposure, or to the desire of reputation. There are many ways in which a man can be unjust without censure from the public, and without violating the laws; but there is no way in which he can be unjust without disregarding Christian benevolence. It is an universal and very sensitive test. He who does regard it, who uniformly considers whether his conduct towards another is consonant with pure good will, cannot be voluntarily unjust; nor can he who commits injustice do it without the consciousness, if he will reflect, that he is violating the law of love. That integrity which is founded upon love, when compared with that which has any other basis, is recommended by its honor and dignity as well as by its rectitude. It is more worthy the man as well as the Christian, more beautiful in the eye of infidelity as well as of religion.

It were easy, if it were necessary, to show in what manner the law of benevolence applies to other relative duties, and in what manner, when applied, it purifies and exalts the fulfilment of them. But our present business is with principles rather than with their specific application.

It is obvious that the obligations of this benevolence are not merely prohibitory—directing us to avoid “working ill” to another, but mandatory—requiring us to do him good. That benevolence which is manifested only by doing no evil, is indeed of a very questionable kind. To abstain from injustice, to abstain from violence, to abstain from slander, is compatible with an extreme deficiency of love. There are many who are neither slanderous, nor ferocious, nor unjust, who have yet very little regard for the benevolence of the gospel. In the illustrations therefore of the obligations of morality, whether private or political, it will sometimes become our business to state, what this benevolence requires as well as what it forbids. The legislator whose laws are contrived only for the detection and punishment of offenders, fulfils but half his duty : if he would conform to the Christian standard, he must provide also for their reformation.

---

CHAPTER VI.

THE IMMEDIATE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD.

Conscience—Its nature—Its authority—Review of opinions respecting a moral sense—Bishop Butler—Lord Bacon—Locke—Southey—Adam Smith—Paley—Milton—Judge Hale—Marcus Antoninus—Epictetus—Seneca—Paul—That every human being possesses a moral law—Pagans—Gradations of light—Prophecy—The immediate communication of the Divine will perpetual—Of national vices : Infanticide : Duelling—Of savage life.

The reader is solicited to approach this subject with that mental seriousness which its nature requires.

Whatever be his opinions upon the subject, whether he believes in the reality of such communication or not, he ought not even to think respecting it but with feelings of seriousness.

In endeavoring to investigate this reality, it becomes especially needful to distinguish the communication of the will of God from those mental phenomena with which it has very commonly been intermingled and confounded. The want of this distinction has occasioned a confusion which has been greatly injurious to the cause of truth. It has occasioned great obscurity of opinion respecting Divine instruction ; and by associating error with truth, has frequently induced scepticism respecting the truth itself.—When an intelligent person perceives that infallible truth or Divine authority is described as belonging to the dictates of “ Conscience,” and when he perceives, as he must perceive, that these dictates are various and sometimes contradictory ; he is in danger of concluding that no unerring and no Divine guidance is accorded to man.

Upon this serious subject it is therefore peculiarly necessary to endeavor to attain distinct ideas, and to employ those words only which convey distinct ideas to other men. The first section of the present chapter will accordingly be devoted to some brief observations respecting the conscience, its nature, and its authority; by which it is hoped the reader will see sufficient reason to distinguish its dictates from that higher guidance, respecting which it is the object of the present chapter to enquire.

For a kindred purpose, it appears requisite to offer a short review of popular and philosophical opinions respecting a Moral Sense. These opinions will be found to have been frequently expressed in great indistinctness and ambiguity of language. The purpose of the writer in referring to these opinions, is to enquire whether they do not generally involve a recognition—obscurely perhaps, but still a recognition—of the principle, that God communicates his will to the mind. If they do this, and if they do it without design or consciousness, no trifling testimony is afforded to the truth of the principle: for how should this principle thus secretly recommended itself to the minds of men, except by the influence of its own evidence?

---

SECTION I.

CONSCIENCE, ITS NATURE AND AUTHORITY.

IN the attempt to attach distinct notions to the term "Conscience," we have to request the reader not to estimate the accuracy of our observations by the notions which he may have habitually connected with the word. Our disquisition is not about terms but truths. If the observations are in themselves just, our principal object is attained. The secondary object, that of connecting truth with appropriate terms, is only so far attainable by a writer, as shall be attained by an uniform employment of words in determinate senses in his own practice.

Men possess notions of right and wrong: they possess a belief that, under given circumstances, they ought to do one thing or to forbear another. This belief I would call a conscientious belief. And when such a belief exists in a man's mind in reference to a number of actions, I would call the sum or aggregate of his notions respecting what is right and wrong, his Conscience.

To possess notions of right and wrong in human conduct—to be convinced that we ought to do or to forbear an action—implies and supposes a sense of obligation existent in the mind. A man who feels that it is wrong for him to do a thing, possesses a sense of obligation to refrain. Into the origin of this sense of obligation, or how it is induced into the mind, we do not enquire : it is sufficient for our purpose that it exists ; and there is no reason to doubt that its existence is consequent of the will of God.

In most men—perhaps in all—this sense of obligation refers with greater or less distinctness, to the will of a superior being. The impression, however obscure, is, in general, fundamentally this : I must do so or so, because God requires it.

It is found that this sense of obligation is sometimes connected, in the minds of separate individuals, with different actions. One man thinks he ought to do a thing from which another thinks he ought to forbear. Upon the great questions of morality there is indeed, in general, a congruity of human judgment ; yet subjects do arise respecting which one man's conscience dictates an act different from that which is dictated by another's. It is not therefore essential to a conscientious judgment of right and wrong, that that judgment should be in strict accordance with the moral law. Some men's consciences dictate that which the moral law does not enjoin ; and this law enjoins some points which are not enforced by every man's conscience. This is precisely the result which, from the nature of the case, it is reasonable to expect. Of these judgments respecting what is right, with which the sense of obligation becomes from time to time connected, some are induced by the instructions or example of others ; some by our own reflection or enquiry ; some perhaps from the written law of revelation ; and some, as we have cause to conclude, from the direct intimations of the Divine will.

It is manifest that if the sense of obligation is sometimes connected with subjects that are proposed to us merely by the instruction of others, or if the connection results from the power of association and habit, or from the fallible investigations of our own minds—that sense of obligation will be connected, in different individuals, with different subjects. So that it may sometimes happen that a man can say, I conscientiously think I ought to do a certain action, and yet that his neighbor can say, I conscientiously think the contrary.

Such considerations enable us to account for the diversity of the dictates of the conscience in individuals respectively. A person is brought up amongst Catholics, and is taught from his childhood that flesh ought not to be eaten in Lent. The arguments of those around him, or perhaps their authority, satisfy him that what he is taught is truth. The sense of obligation thus becomes connected with a refusal to eat flesh in Lent; and thenceforth he says that the abstinence is dictated by his conscience. A Protestant youth is taught the contrary. Argument or authority satisfies him that flesh may lawfully be eaten every day in the year. His sense of obligation therefore is not connected with the abstinence; and thenceforth he says that eating flesh in Lent does not violate his conscience. And so of a multitude of other questions.

When therefore a person says, my conscience dictates to me that I ought to perform such an action, he means—or in the use of such language he ought to mean—that the sense of obligation which subsists in his mind is connected with that action; that, so far as his judgment is enlightened, it is a requisition of the law of God.

But not all our opinions respecting morality and religion are derived from education or reasoning. He who finds in Scripture the precept, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” derives an opinion respecting the duty of loving others from the discovery of this expression of the will of God. His sense of obligation is connected with benevolence towards others in consequence of this discovery ; or, in other words, his understanding has been informed by the moral law, and a new duty is added to those which are dictated by his conscience. Thus it is that Scripture, by informing the judgment, extends the jurisdiction of conscience ; and it is hence, in part, that in those who seriously study the Scriptures, the conscience appears so much more vigilant and operative than in many who do not possess, or do not regard them. Many of the mistakes which education introduces, many of the fallacies to which our own speculations lead us, are corrected by this law. In the case of our Catholic, if a reference to Scripture should convince him that the judgment he has formed respecting abstinence from flesh is not founded on the law of God, the sense of obligation becomes detached from its subject ; and thenceforth his conscience ceases to dictate that he should abstain from flesh in Lent. Yet Scripture does not decide every question respecting human duty, and in some instances individuals judge differently of the decisions which Scripture gives. This, again, occasions some diversity in the dictates of the conscience ; it occasions the sense of obligation to become connected with dissimilar, and possibly incompatible, actions.

But another portion of men's judgments respecting moral affairs is derived from immediate intimations of the Divine will. (This we must be allowed for the present to assume.) These intimations inform sometimes the judgment ; correct its mistakes ; and increase and give distinctness to our knowledge—thus operating, as the Scriptures operate, to connect the sense of obligation more accurately with those actions which are conformable with the will of God. It does not, however, follow, by any sort of necessity, that this higher instruction must correct all the mistakes of the judgment; that because it imparts some light, that light must be perfect day ; that because it communicates some moral or religious truth, it must communicate all the truths of religion and morality. Nor, again, does it follow that individuals must each receive the same access of knowledge. It is evidently as possible that it should be communicated in different degrees to different individuals, as that it should be communicated at all. For which plain reasons we are still to expect, what in fact we find, that although the judgment receives light from a superhuman intelligence, the degree of that light varies in individuals ; and that the sense of obligation is connected with fewer subjects, and attended with less accuracy, in the minds of some men than of others.

With respect to the authority which properly belongs to conscience as a director of individual conduct, it appears manifest, alike from reason and from Scripture, that it is great. Dr. Furneaux says, "To secure the favor of God and the rewards of true religion, we must follow our own consciences and judgments according to the best light we can attain."* And I am especially disposed to add the testimony of Sir William Temple, because he recognizes the doctrine which has just been advanced, that our judgments are enlightened by superhuman agency. "The way to our future happiness must be left, at last, to the impressions made upon every man's belief and conscience either by natural or supernatural arguments and means."†—Accordingly there appears no reason to doubt that some will stand convicted in the sight of the Omniscient Judge, for actions which his moral law has not forbidden ; and that some may be uncondemned for actions which that law does not allow. The distinction here is the same as that to which we have before had occasion to allude, between the desert of the agent and the quality of the act. Of this distinction an illustration is contained in Isaiah x. It was the Divine will that a certain specific course of action should be pursued in punishing the Israelites. For the performance of this, the king of Assyria was employed :—“ I will give him a charge to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets.” This charge the Assyrian monarch fulfilled ; he did the will of God ; but then his intention was criminal ; he “ meant not so : ” and therefore, when the “ whole work ” is performed, “ I will punish,” says the Almighty, “ the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks.”

* Essay on Toleration, p 8.

† Works : v. I. p 55. f. 1740.

But it was said that these principles respecting the authority of conscience were recognized in Scripture. “ One believeth that he may eat all things : another who is weak eateth herbs. One man esteemeth one day above another : another esteemeth every day alike.” Here, then, are differences, nay, contrarieties of conscientious judgments. And what are the parties directed severally to do?—“ Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind ; ” that is, let the full persuasion of his own mind be every man’s rule of action. The situation of these parties was, that one perceived the truth upon the subject, and the other did not ; that in one the sense of obligation was connected with an accurate, in the other with an inaccurate, opinion. Thus, again :—“ I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself ; ” therefore, absolutely speaking, it is lawful to eat all things ; “ but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean.” The question is not whether his judgment was correct, but what that judgment actually was. To the doubter, the uncleanness, that is, the sin of eating, was certain, though the act was right. Again : " All things indeed are pure ; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence." And, again, as a general rule : " He that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith ; for whatsoever is not of faith is sin."*

One observation remains ; that although a man ought to make his conduct conform to his conscience, yet he may sometimes justly be held criminal for the errors of his opinion. Men often judge amiss respecting their duties in consequence of their own faults : some take little pains to ascertain the truth ; some voluntarily exclude knowledge ; and most men would possess more accurate perceptions of the moral law if they sufficiently endeavored to obtain them. And, therefore, although a man may not be punished for a given act which he ignorantly supposes to be lawful, he may be punished for that ignorance in which his supposition originates. Which consideration may perhaps account for the expression, that he who ignorantly failed to do his master's will " shall be beaten with few stripes." There is a degree of wickedness, to the agents of which God at length " sends strong delusion " that they may " believe a lie." In this state of strong delusion they perhaps may, without violating any sense of obligation, do many wicked actions. The principles which have been here delivered would lead us to suppose that the punishment which awaits such men will have respect rather to that intensity of wickedness of which delusion was the consequence, than to those particular acts which they might ignorantly commit under the influence of the delusion itself. This observation is offered to the reader because some writers have obscured the present subject by speculating upon the moral deserts of those desperately bad men, who occasionally have committed atrocious acts under the notion that they were doing right.

* Rom. xiv.

Let us then, when we direct our serious enquiry to the immediate communication of the Divine will, carefully distinguish that communication from the dictates of the conscience. They are separate and distinct considerations. It is obvious that those positions which some persons advance ; — “Conscience is our infallible guide, — “Conscience is the voice of the Deity,” etc., are wholly improper and inadmissible. The term may indeed have been employed synonymously for the voice of God : but this ought never to be done. It is to induce confusion of language respecting a subject which ought always to be distinctly exhibited ; and the necessity for avoiding ambiguity is so much the greater, as the consequences of that ambiguity are more serious : it is obvious that, on these subjects, inaccuracy of language gives rise to serious error of opinion.

REVIEW OF OPINIONS RESPECTING A MORAL SENSE.

The purpose for which this brief review is offered to the reader, is explained in very few words. It is to enquire, by a reference to the written opinions of many persons, whether they do not agree in asserting that our Creator communicates some portions of his moral law immediately to the human mind. These opinions are frequently delivered, as the reader will presently discover, in great ambiguity of language ; but in the midst of this ambiguity there appears to exist one pervading truth—a truth in testimony to which these opinions are not the less satisfactory because, in some instances, the testimony is undesigned. The reader is requested to observe, as he passes on, whether many of the difficulties which enquirers have found or made, are not solved by the supposition of a Divine communication, and whether they can be solved by any other.

“The Author of nature has much better furnished us for a virtuous conduct than our moralists seem to imagine, by almost as quick and powerful instructions as we have for the preservation of our bodies.”*

Bishop Butler says again of conscience, “To preside and govern, from the very economy and constitution of man, belongs to it. This faculty was placed within to be our proper governor, to direct and regulate all undue principles, passions, and motives of action.—It carries its own authority with it, that it is our natural guide, the guide assigned us by the Author of our nature.” Would it have been unreasonable to conclude, that there was at least some connection between this reprover of “all undue principles, passions, and motives,” and that law of which the New Testament speaks, “All things that are reprovèd are made manifest by the light?”†

Blair says, “Conscience is felt to act as the delegate of an invisible Ruler;”—“Conscience is the guide, or the enlightening or directing principle of our conduct.”‡ In this instance, as in many others, conscience appears to be used in an indeterminate sense. Conscience is not an enlightening principle, but a principle which is enlightened. It is not a legislator, but a repository of statutes. Yet the reader will perceive the fundamental truth, that man is in fact illuminated, and illuminated by an invisible Ruler. In the thirteenth sermon there is an expression more distinct: “God has invested conscience with authority to promulgate his laws.” It is obvious that the Divine Being must have communicated his laws, before they could have been promulgated by conscience. In accordance with which the author says in another place

* Dr. Hutcheson: Enquiry concerning Moral Good and Evil.

† Eph. v. 13.

‡ Sermons.

“Under the tuition of God let us put ourselves.”—“A Heavenly Conductor vouchsafes his aid.”—“Divine light descends to guide our steps.”*

Lord Bacon says, “The light of nature not only shines upon the human mind through the medium of a rational faculty, but by an internal instinct according to the law of conscience, which is a sparkle of the purity of man’s first estate.”

“The first principles of morals are the immediate dictates of the moral faculty.”—“By the moral faculty, or conscience, solely, we have the original conception of right and wrong.”—“It is evident that this principle has, from its nature, authority to direct and determine with regard to our conduct: to judge, to acquit or condemn, and even to punish; an authority which belongs to no other principle of the human mind.”

“The Supreme Being has given us this light within to direct our moral conduct.”—“It is the candle of the Lord, set up within us to guide our steps.”† This is almost the language of Christianity, “That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.”‡ I do not mean to affirm that the author of the essays speaks exclusively of the same Divine guidance as the apostle; but surely, if conscience operates as such a “light within,” as “the candle of the Lord,” it can require no reasoning to convince us that it is illuminated from heaven. The indistinctness of notions which such language exhibits, appears to arise from inaccurate views of the nature of conscience. The writer does not distinguish between the recipient and the source; between the enlightened principle and the enlightening beam. The apostle speaks only of the last ; the uninspired enquirer speaks, without discrimination, of both ;—and hence the ambiguity.

* Sermon 7.

† Dr. Reid: Essay on the Powers of the Human Mind, Essay 3 c. 8. &c.

‡ John i. 9.

“And this law is that innate sense of right and wrong, of virtue and vice, which every man carries in his own bosom.”—“These impressions, operating on the mind of man, bespeak a law written on his heart.” —“This secret sense of right and wrong, for wise purposes so deeply implanted by our Creator on the human mind, has the nature, force, and effect of a law.”*

Locke : “The Divine law, that law which God has set to the actions of men, whether promulgated to them by the light of nature or the voice of revelation, is the measure of sin and duty. That God has given a rule whereby men should govern themselves, I think there is nobody so brutish as to deny.”† The reader should remark, that revelation and “the light of nature” are here represented as being jointly and equally the law of God.

Adam Smith : “It is altogether absurd and unintelligible, to suppose that the first perceptions of right and wrong can be derived from reason. These first perceptions cannot be the object of reason, but of immediate sense and feeling.”—“Though man has been rendered the immediate judge of mankind, an appeal lies from his sentence to a much higher tribunal, to the tribunal of their own consciences, to that of the man within the breast, the great judge and arbiter of their conduct.” In some cases in which censure is violently poured upon us, the judgments of the man within, are, however, much shaken in the steadiness and firmness of their decision. “In such cases, this demigod within the breast appears, like the demigods of the poets, though partly of immortal, yet, partly, too, of mortal extraction." Our moral faculties "were set up within us to be the supreme arbiters of all our actions." "The rules which they prescribe are to be regarded as the commands and laws of the Deity, promulgated by those vicegerents which he has thus set up within us." "Some questions must be left altogether to the decision of the man within the breast." And let the reader mark what follows: "If we listen with diligent and reverential attention to what he suggests to us, his voice will never deceive us. We shall stand in no need of casuistic rules to direct our conduct." How wonderful that such a man, who uses almost the language of Scripture, appears not even to have thought of the truth—"the Anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you!" for he does not appear to have thought of it. He intimates that this vicegerent of God, this undeceiving teacher to whom we are to listen with reverential attention, is some "contrivance or mechanism within;" and says that to examine what contrivance or mechanism it is, "is a mere matter of philosophical curiosity."*

* Dr. Shepherd’s Discourse on Future Existence.

† Essay, b. 2. c. 28.

A matter of philosophical curiosity, Dr. Paley seems to have thought a kindred enquiry to be. He discusses the question, whether there is such a thing as a moral sense or not; and thus sums up the argument: "Upon the whole it seems to me, either that there exist no such instincts as compose what is called the moral sense, or that they are not now to be distinguished from prejudices and habits."—"This celebrated question therefore becomes, in our system, a question of pure curiosity; and as such, we dismiss it to the determination of those who are more inquisitive than we are concerned to be, about the natural history and constitution of the human species."† But in another work, a work in which he did not bind himself to the support of a philosophical system, he holds other language: "Conscience, our own conscience; is to be our guide in all things." "It is through the whisperings of conscience that the Spirit speaks. If men are wilfully deaf to their consciences they cannot hear the Spirit. If, hearing, if being compelled to hear the remonstrances of conscience, they nevertheless decide and resolve and determine to go against them, then they grieve, then they defy, then they do despite to, the Spirit of God." "Is it superstition? Is it not on the contrary a just and reasonable piety to implore of God the guidance of his Holy Spirit, when we have any thing of great importance to decide upon or undertake?"—"It being confessed that we cannot ordinarily distinguish, at the time, the suggestions of the Spirit from the operations of our minds, it may be asked, How are we to listen to them? The answer is, by attending, universally, to the admonitions within us."* The tendency of these quotations to enforce our general argument, is plain and powerful.

* Theory of Mor. Sent.

† Mor. and Pol. Phil. b 1, c. 5.

"And I will place within them as a guide,
My umpire, Conscience; whom if they will hear Light after light, well used, they shall attain."†

This is the language of Milton; and we have thus his testimony added to the many, that God has placed within us an umpire which shall pronounce, His own laws in our hearts. Thus in his "Christian Doctrine" more clearly; "They can lay claim to nothing more than human powers, assisted by that spiritual illumination which is common to all."‡

Judge Hale: "Any man that sincerely and truly fears Almighty God, and calls and relies upon him for his direction, has it as really as a son has the counsel and direction of his father; and though the voice be not audible nor discernible by sense, yet is equally as real as if a man heard a voice saying, 'This is the way, walk in it.' "

* Sermons.

† Par. Lost, iii. 194.

‡ P. 81.

The sentiments of the ancient philosophers, etc., should not be forgotten, and the rather because their language is frequently much more distinct and satisfactory than that of the refined enquirers of the present day.

Marcus Antoninus : "He who is well disposed will do every thing dictated by the divinity—a particle or portion of Himself, which God has given to each as a guide and a leader."*—Aristotle : "The mind of man hath a near affinity to God : there is a divine ruler in him."—Plutarch : "The light of truth is a law, not written in tables or books but dwelling in the mind, always as a living rule which never permits the soul to be destitute of an interior guide."—Hieron says that the universal light, shining in the conscience, is "a domestic God, a God within the hearts and souls of men."—Epictetus : "God has assigned to each man a director, his own good genius, a guardian whose vigilance no slumbers interrupt, and whom no false reasonings can deceive. So that when you have shut your door, say not that you are alone, for your God is within.—What need have you of outward light to discover what is done, or to light to good actions, who have God or that genius or divine principle for your light?"† Such citations might be greatly multiplied ; but one more must suffice. Seneca says, "We find felicity—in a pure and untainted mind, which if it were not holy were not fit to entertain the Deity." How like the words of an apostle !—"If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy ; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."‡ The philosopher again : "There is a holy spirit in us ;"§ and again the * Lib. 5, Sect. 27.

† 1 Cor. iii. 17.

‡ Lib. I, c. 14.

§ De Benef. c. 17, etc.

apostle: "Know ye not that" the "Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"*

Now respecting the various opinions which have been laid before the reader, there is one observation that will generally apply—that they unite in assigning certain important attributes or operations to some principle or power existent in the human mind. They affirm that this principle or power possess wisdom to direct us aright—that its directions are given instantaneously as the individual needs them—that it is inseparably attended with unquestionable authority to command. That such a principle or power does, therefore, actually exist, can need little further proof; for a concurrent judgment upon a question of personal experience cannot surely be incorrect. To say that individuals express their notions of this principle or power by various phraseology, that they attribute to it different degrees of superhuman intelligence, or that they refer for its origin to contradictory causes, does not affect the general argument. The great point for our attention, is, not the designation or the supposed origin of this guide, but the attributes; and these attributes appear to be divine.

THE IMMEDIATE COMMUNICATION OF THE WILL OF GOD.

I. That every reasonable human being is a moral agent—that is, that every such human being is responsible to God, no one perhaps denies. There can be no responsibility where there is no knowledge: "Where there is no law there is no transgression." So then every human being possess, or is furnished with, moral knowledge and a moral law. "If we admit that mankind, without an outward revelation, are nevertheless sinners, we must also admit that mankind, without such a revelation, are nevertheless in possession of the law of God.”*

* 1 Cor. iii. 16.

Whence then do they obtain it?—a question to which but one answer can be given; from the Creator himself. It appears therefore to be almost demonstratively shown, that God does communicate his will immediately to the minds of those who have no access to the external expression of it. It is always to be remembered that, as the majority of mankind do not possess the written communication of the will of God, the question, as it respects them, is between an Immediate communication and none; between such a communication, and the denial of their responsibility in a future state; between such a communication, and the reducing them to the condition of the beasts that perish.

II. No one perhaps will imagine that this argument is confined to countries which the external light of Christianity has not reached. “Whoever expects to find in the Scriptures a specific direction for every moral doubt that arises, looks for more than he will meet with;”† so that even in Christian countries there exist, some portion of that necessity for other guidance, which has been seen to exist in respect to pagans. Thus Adam Smith says that there are some questions which it “is perhaps altogether impossible to determine by any precise rules,” and that they “must be left altogether to the decision of the man within the breast.”—But, indeed, when we speak of living in Christian countries, and of having access to the external revelation, we are likely to mislead ourselves with respect to the actual condition of “Christian” people. Persons talk of possessing the Bible, as if every one who lived in a Protestant country had a Bible in his pocket and could read it. But there are thousands, perhaps millions, in Christian and in Protestant countries, who know very little of what Christianity enjoins. They probably do not possess the Scriptures, or if they do, probably cannot read them. What they do know they learn from others—from others who may be little solicitous to teach them, or to teach them aright. Such persons therefore are, to a considerable extent, practically in the same situation as those who have not heard of Christianity, and there is therefore to them a corresponding need of a direct communication of knowledge from heaven. But if we see the need of such knowledge extending itself thus far, who will call in question the doctrine, that it is imparted to the whole human race?

* Gurney : Essays on Christianity, p. 516.

† Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 1, c. 4.

These are offered as considerations involving an antecedent probability of the truth of our argument. The reader is not required to give his assent to it as to a dogma of which he can discover neither the reason nor the object. Here is probability very strong; here is usefulness very manifest, and very great:—so that the mind may reasonably be open to the reception of evidence, whatever Truth that evidence shall establish.

If the written revelation were silent respecting the immediate communication of the Divine will, that silence might perhaps rightly be regarded as conclusive evidence that it is not conveyed; because it is so intimately connected with the purposes to which that revelation is directed, that scarcely any other explanation could be given of its silence than that the communication did not exist. That the Scriptures declare that God has communicated light and knowledge to some men by the immediate exertion of his own agency, admits not of dispute: but this it is obvious is not sufficient for our purpose; and it is in the belief that they declare that God imparts some knowledge to all men, that we thus appeal to their testimony.

Now here the reader should especially observe, that where the Christian Scriptures speak of the existence and influence of the Divine Spirit on the mind, they commonly speak of its higher operations; not of its office as a moral guide, but as a purifier, and sanctifier, and comforter of the soul. They speak of it in reference to its sacred and awful operations in connection with human salvation: and thus it happens that very many citations which, if we were writing an essay on religion, would be perfectly appropriate, do not possess that distinct and palpable application to an argument, which goes no further than to affirm that it is a moral guide. And yet it may most reasonably be remarked, that if it has pleased the Universal Parent thus, and for these awful purposes, to visit the minds of those who are obedient to his power—he will not suffer them to be destitute of a moral guidance. The less must be supposed to be involved in the greater.

Our argument does not respect the degrees of illumination which may be possessed, respectively, by individuals,* or in different ages of the world. There were motives, easily conceived, for imparting a greater degree of light and of power at the introduction of Christianity than in the present day; accordingly there are many expressions in the New Testament which speak of high degrees of light and power, and which, however they may affirm the general existence of a Divine guidance, are not descriptive of the general nor of the present condition of mankind. Nevertheless if the records of Christianity, in describing these greater “gifts,” inform us that a gift, similar in its nature but without specification of its amount, is imparted to all men, it is sufficient. Although it is one thing for the Creator to impart a general capacity to distinguish right from wrong, and another to impart miraculous power ; one thing to inform his accountable creature that lying is evil, and another to enable him to cure a leprosy ; yet this affords no reason to deny that the nature of the gift is not the same, or that both are not Divine. "The degree of light may vary according as one man has a greater measure than another. But the light of an apostle is not one thing and the light of the heathen another thing, distinct in principle. They differ only in degree of power, distinctness, and splendor of manifestation."*

* I am disposed to offer a simple testimony to what I believe to be a truth; that even in the present day, the Divine illumination and power is sometimes imparted to individuals in a degree much greater than is necessary for the purposes of mere moral direction; that on subjects connected with their own personal condition or that of others, light is sometimes imparted in greater brightness and splendor than is ordinarily enjoyed by mankind, or than is necessary for our ordinary direction in life.

So early as Gen. vi. there is a distinct declaration of the moral operation of the Deity on the human mind ; not upon the pious and the good, but upon those who were desperately wicked, so that even "every imagination of the thoughts of their heart was only evil continually."—"My spirit shall not always strive with man." Upon this passage a good and intelligent man writes thus ; "Surely, if His spirit has striven with them until that time, until they were so desperately wicked, and wholly corrupted, that not only some, but every imagination of their hearts was evil, yes, only evil, and that continually, we may well believe the express Scripture assertion that 'a manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.' "†

Respecting some of the prophetic passages in the Hebrew Scriptures, it may be observed that there ap-* Hancock : Essay on Instinct, etc., p. 2, c. 7, s. 1. I take this opportunity of acknowledging the obligations I am under to this work, for many of the "Opinions" which are cited in the last section.

† Job Scott's Journal, c. 1.

pears a want of complete adaptation to the immediate purpose of our argument, because they speak of that, prospectively, which our argument assumes to be true retrospectively also. “After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts;”* from which the reader may possibly conclude that before those days no such internal law was imparted. Yet the preceding paragraph might assure him of the contrary, and that the prophet indicated an increase rather than a commencement of internal guidance. Under any supposition it does not affect the argument as it respects the present condition of the human race; for the prophecy is twice quoted in the Christian Scriptures, and is expressly stated to be fulfilled. Once the prophecy is quoted almost at length, and in the other instance the important clause is retained, “I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them.”†

“And all thy children,” says Isaiah, “shall be taught of the Lord.” Christ himself quotes this passage in illustrating the nature of his own religion: “It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God.”‡

“Thine eyes shall see thy teachers: and thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it; when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left.”§

The Christian Scriptures, if they be not more explicit, are more abundant in their testimony. Paul addresses the “foolish Galatians.” The reader should observe their character; for some Christians who acknowledge the Divine influence on the minds of eminently good men, are disposed to question it in reference to others. These foolish Galatians had turned * Jer. xxxi. 33.

† Heb. viii. 10; and x. 16.

‡ John vi. 45.

§ Isa. xxx. 20, 21.

again to “weak and beggarly elements,” and their dignified instructor was afraid of them, lest he had bestowed upon them labor in vain. Nevertheless, to them he makes the solemn declaration, “God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts” *

John writes a General Epistle, an epistle which was addressed, of course, to a great variety of characters, of whom some, it is probable, possessed little more of the new religion than the name. The apostle writes—“Hereby we know that he abideth in us by the Spirit which he hath given us.” †

The solemn declarations which follow are addressed to large numbers of recent converts, of converts whom the writer had been severely reproving for improprieties of conduct, for unchristian contentions, and even for the greater faults: “Ye are the temple of the living God, as God hath said, I will dwell in them and walk in them.”—“What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you?” ‡ “Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.” §

And with respect to the moral operations of this sacred power:—“As touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another;” || that is, taught a duty of morality.

Thus also:—“The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.” ¶ or in other words, teaching all men moral laws—laws

* Gal. iv. 6.

† I John iii. 24.

‡ I Cor. vi. 19.

§ I Cor. iii. 16.

|| I Thess. iv. 9.

¶ Tit. ii. 11, 12.

both mandatory and prohibitory, teaching both what to do and what to avoid.

And very distinctly :—“The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.”* A light to lighten the Gentiles.”† “I am the Light of the world.”‡ “The true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.”§

“When the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law are a law unto themselves, which show the work of the law written in their hearts.”||—written, it may be asked by whom but by that Being who said, “I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts?”¶

To such evidence from the written revelation, I know of no other objection which can be urged than the supposition that this Divine instruction, though existing eighteen hundred years ago, does not exist now. To which it appears sufficient to reply, that it existed not only eighteen hundred years ago, but before the period of the Deluge ; and that the terms in which the Scriptures speak of it are incompatible with the supposition of a temporary duration : “all taught of God :” “in you all :” “hath appeared unto all men :” “given to every man :” “every man that cometh into the world.” Besides, there is not the most remote indication in the Christian Scriptures that this instruction would not be perpetual ; and their silence on such a subject, a subject involving the most sacred privileges of our race, must surely be regarded as positive evidence that this instruction would be accorded to us for ever.

---

How clear soever appears to be the evidence of reason, that man, being universally a moral and accountable

* 1 Cor. xii. 7.

† Luke ii. 32.

‡ John viii. 12.

§ John i. 9.

|| Rom. ii. 14.

¶ Jer. xxxi. 33.

agent, must be possessed, universally, of a moral law ; and how distinct soever the testimony of revelation, that he does universally possess it—objections are still urged against its existence.

Of these, perhaps the most popular are those which are founded upon the varying dictates of the “Conscience.” If the view which we have taken of the nature and operations of the conscience be just, these objections will have little weight. That the dictates of the conscience should vary in individuals respectively, is precisely what, from the circumstances of the case, is to be expected ; but this variation does not impeach the existence of that purer ray which, whether in less or greater brightness, irradiates the heart of man.

I am, however, disposed here to notice the objections* that may be founded upon national derelictions of portions of the moral law. “There is,” says Locke, “scarce that principle of morality to be named, or rule of virtue to be thought on, which is not somewhere or other slighted and condemned by the general fashion of whole societies of men, governed by practical opinions and rules of living quite opposite to others.”—And Paley : “There is scarcely a single vice which, in some age or country of the world, has not been countenanced by public opinion : in one country it is esteemed an office of piety in children to sustain their aged parents, in another to dispatch them out of the way : suicide in one age of the world has been heroism, in another felony ; theft which is punished by most laws, by the laws of Sparta was not unfrequently rewarded : you shall hear duelling alternately reprobated and applauded according to the sex, age, or station of the person you converse with : the forgiveness of injuries and insults is accounted by one sort of people magnanimity, by another, meanness.”†

* Not urged specifically, perhaps, against the Divine guidance ; but they will equally afford an illustration of the truth.

† Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 1. c. 5.

Upon all which I observe, that to whatever purpose these reasonings are directed, they are defective in an essential point. They show us indeed what the external actions of men have been, but give no proof that these actions were conformable with the secret internal judgment : and this last is the only important point. That a rule of virtue is "slighted and condemned by the general fashion," is no sort of evidence that those who joined in this general fashion did not still know that it was a rule of virtue. There are many duties which, in the present day, are slighted by the general fashion, and yet no man will stand up and say that they are not duties. "There is scarcely a single vice which has not been countenanced by public opinion ;" but where is the proof that it has been approved by private and secret judgment? There is a great deal of difference between those sentiments which men seem to entertain respecting their duties when they give expression to "public opinion," and when they rest their heads on their pillows in calm reflection. "Suicide in one age of the world has been heroism, in another felony ;" but it is not every action which a man says is heroic, that he believes is right. "Forgiveness of injuries and insults is accounted by one sort of people magnanimity, by another, meanness ;" and yet they who thus vulgarly employ the word meanness, do not imagine that forbearance and placability are really wrong.

I have met with an example which serves to confirm me in the judgment, that public notions or rather public actions are a very equivocal evidence of the real sentiments of mankind. "Can there be greater barbarity than to hurt an infant? Its helplessness, its innocence, its amiableness, call forth the compassion even of an enemy.—What then should we imagine must be the heart of a parent who would injure that weakness which a furious enemy is afraid to violate? Yet the exposition, that is, the murder of new-born infants, was a practice allowed of in almost all the states of Greece, even among the polite and civilized Athenians." This seems a strong case against us. But what were the grounds upon which this atrocity was defended?—"Philosophers, instead of censuring, supported the horrible abuse, by far-fetched considerations of public utility."*

By far-fetched considerations of public utility! Why had they recourse to such arguments as these? Because they found that the custom could not be reconciled with direct and acknowledged rules of virtue: because they felt and knew that it was wrong. The very circumstance that they had recourse to "far-fetched arguments," is evidence that they were conscious that clearer and more immediate arguments were against them. They knew that infanticide was an immoral act.

I attach some importance to the indications which this class of reasoning affords of the comparative uniformity of human opinion, even when it is nominally discordant. One other illustration may be offered from more private life. Boswell in his Life of Johnson, says that he proposed the question to the moralist, "Whether duelling was contrary to the laws of Christianity?" Let the reader notice the essence of the reply: "Sir, as men become in a high degree refined, various causes of offence arise which are considered to be of such importance that life must be staked to atone for them, though in reality they are not so. In a state of highly polished society, an affront is held to be a serious injury. It must therefore be resented, or rather a duel must be fought upon it, as men have agreed to banish from their society one who puts up with an affront without fighting a duel. Now, Sir, it is never unlawful to fight in self-defence. He then who fights a duel, does not fight from passion against his antagonist, but out of self-defence, to avert the stigma of the world, and to prevent himself from being driven from society.—While such notions prevail no doubt a man may lawfully fight a duel.” The question was, the consistency of duelling with the laws of Christianity; and there is not a word about Christianity in the reply. Why? Because its laws can never be shown to allow duelling; and Johnson doubtless knew this. Accordingly, like the philosophers who tried to justify the kindred crime of infanticide, he had recourse to “far-fetched considerations,”—to the high polish of society—to the stigma of the world—to the notions that prevail. Now, whilst the readers of Boswell commonly think they have Johnson’s authority in favor of duelling, I think they have his authority against it. I think that the mode in which he justified duelling, evinced his consciousness that it was not compatible with the moral law.

* Theory Mor. Sent. p. 5, c. 2.

And thus it is, that with respect to public opinions, and general fashions, and thence descending to private life, we shall find that men very usually know the requisitions of the moral law better than they seem to know them; and that he who estimates the moral knowledge of societies or individuals by their common language, refers to an uncertain and fallacious standard.

After all, the uniformity of human opinion respecting the great laws of morality is very remarkable. Sir James Mackintosh speaks of Grotius, who had cited poets, orators, historians, etc., and says, “He quotes them as witnesses, whose conspiring testimony, mightily strengthened and confirmed by their discordance on almost every other subject, is a conclusive proof of the unanimity of the whole human race, on the great rules of duty and fundamental principles of morals.”*

From poets and orators we may turn to savage life.

* Disc. on Study of Law of Nature and Nations.

In 1683, that is, soon after the colonization of Pennsylvania, the founder of the colony held a "council and consultation" with some of the Indians. In the course of the interview it appeared that these savages believed in a state of future retribution; and they described their simple ideas of the respective states of the good and bad. The vices that they enumerated as those which would consign them to punishment, are remarkable, inasmuch as they so nearly correspond to similar enumerations in the Christian Scriptures. They were "theft, swearing, lying, whoring, murder, and the like;"* and the New Testament affirms that those who are guilty of adultery, fornication, lying, theft, murder, etc., shall not inherit the kingdom of God. The same writer having on his travels met with some Indians, stopped and gave them some good and serious advices. "They wept," says he, "and tears ran down their naked bodies. They smote their hands upon their breasts and said, 'The Good man here told them what I said was all good.' "†

But reasonings such as these are in reality not necessary to the support of the truth of the immediate communication of the will of God; because if the variations in men's notions of right and wrong were greater than they are, they would not impeach the existence of that communication. In the first place, we never affirm that the Deity communicates all his law to every man: and in the second place, it is sufficiently certain that multitudes know his laws, and yet neglect to fulfill them.

If, in conclusion, it should be asked, What assistance can be yielded, in the investigation of publicly authorized rules of virtue, by the discussions of the present chapter? we answer, Very little. But when it is asked, * John Richardson's Life.

† Ibid.

Of what importance are they as illustrating the principles of morality? we answer, Very much. If there be two sources from which it has pleased God to enable mankind to know His will—a law written externally, and a law communicated to the heart—it is evident that both must be regarded as principles of morality, and that, in a work like the present, both should be illustrated as such. It is incidental to the latter mode of moral guidance, that it is little adapted to the formation of external rules: but it is of high and solemn importance to our species for the secret direction of the individual man.

ESSAY I.

PART II.

SUBORDINATE MEANS OF DISCOVERING THE DIVINE WILL.

---

CHAPTER I.

THE LAW OF THE LAND.

Its authority—Limits to its authority—Morality sometimes prohibits what the law permits.

The authority of civil government as a director of individual conduct, is explicitly asserted in the Christian Scriptures :—“ Be subject to principalities and powers—Obey magistrates,”*—“ Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord’s sake : whether it be to the king, as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well.”†

By this general sanction of civil government, a multitude of questions respecting human duty are at once decided. In ordinary cases, he upon whom the magistrate imposes a law needs not to seek for knowledge of his duty upon the subject from a higher source. The Divine will is sufficiently indicated by the fact that the magistrate commands. Obedience to the law is obedience to the expressed will of God. He who, in the payment of a tax to support the just exercise of government, conforms to the law of the land, as truly obeys the Divine will, as if the Deity had regulated questions of taxation, by express rules.

* Tit. iii. 1.

† 1 Pet. ii. 13.

In thus founding the authority of civil government upon the precepts of revelation, we refer to the ultimate, and for that reason to the most proper sanction. Not, indeed, that if revelation had been silent, the obligation of obedience might not have been deduced from other considerations. The utility of government—its tendency to promote the order and happiness of society—powerfully recommend its authority; so powerfully indeed, that it is probable that the worst government which ever existed, was incomparably better than none; and we shall hereafter have occasion to see that considerations of utility involve actual moral obligation.

The purity and practical excellence of the motives to civil obedience which are proposed in the Christian Scriptures, are especially worthy of regard. “Submit for the Lord’s sake.” “Be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience’ sake.” Submission for wrath’s sake, that is, from fear of penalty, implies a very inferior motive to submission upon grounds of principle and duty; and as to practical excellence, who cannot perceive that he who regulates his obedience by the motives of Christianity, acts more worthily, and honorably, and consistently, than he who is influenced only by fear of penalties? The man who obeys the laws for conscience’ sake, will obey always; alike when disobedience would be unpunished and unknown, as when it would be detected the next hour. The magistrate has a security for such a man’s fidelity, which no other motive can supply. A smuggler will import his kegs if there is no danger of a seizure—a Christian will not buy the brandy though no one knows it but himself.

It is to be observed, that the obligation of civil obedience is enforced, whether the particular command of the law is in itself sanctioned by morality or not. Antecedently to the existence of the law of the magistrate respecting the importation of brandy, it was of no consequence in the view of morality whether brandy was imported or not ; but the prohibition of the magistrate involves a moral obligation to refrain. Other doctrine has been held ; and it has been asserted, that unless the particular law is enforced by morality, it does not become obligatory by the command of the state.* But if this were true—if no law was obligatory that was not previously enjoined by morality, no moral obligation would result from the law of the land. Such a question is surely set at rest by, “Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man.”

But the authority of civil government is a subordinate authority. If, from any cause, the magistrate enjoins that which is prohibited by the moral law, the duty of obedience is withdrawn. “All human authority ceases at the point where obedience becomes criminal.” The reason is simple ; that when the magistrate enjoins what is criminal, he has exceeded his power : “the minister of God” has gone beyond his commission. There is, in our day, no such thing as a moral plenipotentiary.

Upon these principles, the first teachers of Christianity acted when the rulers “called them, and commanded them not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus.”—“Whether,” they replied, “it be right in the sight of God, to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.”† They accordingly “entered into the temple early in the morning and taught :” and when, subsequently, they were again brought before the council and interrogated, they replied, “We ought to obey God rather than men ;” and notwithstanding the renewed command of the council, “daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.”‡ Nor let any one suppose that there is any thing religious in the motives of the apostles, which involved a peculiar obligation upon them to refuse obedience: we have already seen that the obligation to conform to religious duty and to moral duty, is one.

* See Godwin’s Political Justice.

† Acts iv. 18.

‡ Acts v. 29, 42.

To disobey the civil magistrate is however not a light thing. When the Christian conceives that the requisitions of government and of a higher law are conflicting, it is needful that he exercise a strict scrutiny into the principles of his conduct. But, if upon such scrutiny, the contrariety of requisitions appears real, no room is left for doubt respecting his duty, or for hesitation in performing it. With the consideration of consequences he has then no concern: whatever they may be, his path is plain before him.

It is sufficiently evident that these doctrines respect non-compliance only. It is one thing not to comply with laws, and another to resist those who make or enforce them. He who thinks the payment of tithes unchristian ought to decline to pay them; but he would act upon strange principles of morality, if, when an officer came to distrain upon his property, he forcibly resisted his authority.*

If there are cases in which the positive injunctions of the law may be disobeyed, it is manifest that the mere permission of the law to do a given action, conveys no sufficient authority to perform it. There are, perhaps, no disquisitions, connected with the present subject, which are of greater practical utility than those which show, that not every thing which is legally right is morally right; that a man may be entitled by law to privileges which morality forbids him to exercise or to possessions which morality forbids him to enjoy.

* We speak here of private obligations only. Respecting the political obligations which result from the authority of civil government, some observations will be found in the chapter on Civil Obedience. Ess. iii. c. v.

As to the possession, for example, of property : the general foundation of the right to property is the law of the land. But as the law of the land is itself subordinate, it is manifest that the right to property must be subordinate also, and must be held in subjection to the moral law. A man who has a wife and two sons, and who is worth fifteen hundred pounds, dies without a will. The widow possesses no separate property, but the sons have received from another quarter ten thousand pounds a-piece. Now, of the fifteen hundred pounds which the intestate left, the law assigns five hundred to the mother, and five hundred to each son. Are these sons morally permitted to take each his five hundred pounds, and to leave their parent with only five hundred for her support? Every man I hope will answer, No : and the reason is this ; that the moral law, which is superior to the law of the land, forbids them to avail themselves of their legal rights. The moral law requires justice and benevolence, and a due consideration for the wants and necessities of others ; and if justice and benevolence would be violated by availing ourselves of legal permissions, those permissions are not sufficient authorities to direct our conduct.

It has been laid down, that “so long as we keep within the design and intention of a law, that law will justify us, in foro conscientiæ as in foro humano, whatever be the equity or expediency of the law itself.”* From the example which has been offered, I think it sufficiently appears that this maxim is utterly unsound : at any rate, its unsoundness will appear from a brief historical fact. During the Revolutionary war in America, the Virginian Legislature passed a law, by which “it was enacted, that all merchants and planters in Virginia who owed money to British merchants, should be exonerated from their debts, if they paid the money due into the public treasury instead of sending it to Great Britain; and all such as stood indebted, were invited to come forward and give their money, in this manner, towards the support of the contest in which America was then engaged." Now, according to the principles of Paley, these Virginian planters would have been justified, in foro conscientiæ, in defrauding the British merchants of the money which was their due. It is quite clear that the "design and intention of the law" was to allow the fraud—the planters were even invited to commit it; and yet the heart of every reader will tell him, that to have availed themselves of the legal permission, would have been an act of flagitious dishonesty. The conclusion is therefore distinct—that legal decisions respecting property, are not always a sufficient warrant for individual conduct. To the extreme disgrace of these planters it should be told, that although at first, when they would have gained little by the fraud, few of them paid their debts into the treasury, yet afterwards many large sums were paid. The Legislature offered to take the American paper money: and as this paper money, in consequence of its depreciation, was not worth a hundredth part of its value in specie, the planters, in thus paying their debts to their own government, paid but one pound instead of a hundred, and kept the remaining ninety-nine in their own pockets! Profligate as these planters and as this Legislature were, it is pleasant for the sake of America to add, that in 1796, after the Supreme Court of the United States had been erected, the British merchants brought the affair before it, and the judges directed that every one of these debts should again be paid to the rightful creditors.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. iii. p. 1, c. 4.

It might be almost imagined that the moral philospher designed to justify such conduct as that of the planters. He says, when a man "refuses to pay a debt of the reality of which he is conscious, he cannot plead the intention of the statute, unless he could show that the law intended to interpose its supreme authority to acquit men of debts of the existence and justice of which they were themselves sensible."* Now the planters could show that this was the intention of the law, and yet they were not justified in availing themselves of it. The error of the moralist is founded in the assumption, that there is "supreme authority" in the law. Make that authority, as it really is, subordinate, and the error and the fallacious rule which is founded upon it, will be alike corrected.

In applying to the law of the land as a moral guide, it is of importance to distinguish its intention from its letter. The intention is not, indeed, as we have seen, a final consideration, but the design of a legislature is evidently of greater import, and consequent obligation, than the literal interpretation of the words in which that design is proposed to be expressed. The want of a sufficient attention to this simple rule, occasions many snares to private virtue, and the commission of much practical injustice. In consequence, partly of the inadequacy of all language, and partly of the inability of those who frame laws, accurately to provide for cases which subsequently arise, it happens that the literal application of a law, sometimes frustrates the intention of the legislator, and violates the obligations of justice. Whatever be the cause, it is found in practice, that courts of law usually regard the letter of a statute rather than its general intention; and hence it happens that many duties devolve upon individuals in the application of the laws in their own affairs. If legal courts usually decide by the letter, and if decision by the letter often defeats the objects of the legislator and the claims of justice, how shall these claims be satisfied except by the conscientious and forbearing integrity of private men? Of the cases in which this integrity should be brought into exercise, several examples will be offered in the early part of the next Essay.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. iii, p. 1, c. 4.

---

CHAPTER II.

THE LAW OF NATURE.

Its authority—Limits to its authority—Obligations resulting from the rights of Nature—Incorrect ideas attached to the word Nature.

We here use the term, the law of nature, as a convenient title under which to advert to the authority, in moral affairs, of what are called natural instincts and natural rights.

“They who rank pity among the original impulses of our nature, rightly contend that when this principle prompts us to the relief of human misery, it indicates the divine intention and our duty. Indeed, the same conclusion is deducible from the existence of the passion, whatever account be given of its origin. Whether it be an instinct or a habit, it is in fact a property of our nature which God appointed.”*

I should reason similarly respecting natural rights—the right to life—to personal liberty—to a share of the productions of the earth. The fact that life is given us by our Creator—that our personal powers and mental dispositions are adapted by Him to personal liberty—and that He has constituted our bodies so as to need the productions of the earth, are satisfactory indications of the Divine will, and of human duty.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 3, p. 2, c. 5.

So that we conclude the general proposition is true—that a regard to the law of nature, in estimating human duty, is accordant with the will of God. There is little necessity for formally insisting on the authority of the law of nature, because few are disposed to dispute that authority, at least when their own interests are served by appealing to it. If this authority were questioned, perhaps it might be said that the expression of the Divine will tacitly sanctions it, because that expression is addressed to us under the supposition that our constitution is such as it is; and because some of the Divine precepts appear to specify a point at which the authority of the law of nature stops. To say that a rule is only in some cases wrong, is to say, that in many it is right: to which may be added the consideration, that the tendency of the law of nature is manifestly beneficial. No man questions that the “original impulses of our nature” tend powerfully to the well-being of the species.

In speaking of the instincts of nature, we enter into no curious definitions of what constitutes an instinct. Whether any of our passions or emotions be properly instinctive, or the effect of association, is of little consequence to the purpose, so long as they actually subsist in the human economy, and so long as we have reason to believe that their subsistence there is in accordance with the Divine will.

But the authority of the law of nature, like every other authority, is subordinate to that of the moral law. This indeed is sufficiently indicated by those reasonings which show the universal supremacy of that law. Yet it may be of advantage to remember such expressions as these: “Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But fear him which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell."* This appears distinctly to place an instinct of nature in subordination to the moral law. The "fear of them that kill the body," results from the instinct of self-preservation; and by this instinct we are not to be guided when the Divine will requires us to repress its voice.

Parental affection has been classed amongst the instincts.† The declaration, "He that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me,"‡ clearly subjects this instinct to the higher authority of the Divine will; for the "love" of God is to be manifested by obedience to his law. Another declaration to the same import subjects also the instinct of self-preservation: "If a man hate not (that is by comparison) his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."|| And here it is remarkable, that these affections or instincts are adduced for the purpose of inculcating their subordination to the moral law.

Upon one of the most powerful instincts of nature, the restraints of revelation are emphatically laid. Its operation is restricted, not to a few of its possible objects, but exclusively to one; and to that one upon an express and specified condition.§

The propriety of holding the natural impulses in subjection to a higher law, appears to be asserted in this language of Dugald Stewart: "The dictates of reason and conscience inform us, in language which it is impossible to mistake, that it is sometimes a duty to check the most amiable and pleasing emotions of the heart; to withdraw, for example, from the sight of those distresses which stronger claims forbid us to relieve, and to deny ourselves that exquisite luxury which arises from the exercise of humanity." Even that morality which is not founded upon religion, recommends the same truth. Godwin says, that if Fenelon were in his palace, and it took fire, and it so happened that the life either of himself or of his chambermaid must be sacrificed, it would be the duty of the woman to repress the instinct of self-preservation, and sacrifice hers—because Fenelon would do more good in the world.* If the morality of scepticism inculcates this subjugation of our instincts to indeterminate views of advantage, much more does the morality of the New Testament teach us to subject them to the determinate will of God.

* Luke xii. 4. † Dr. Price. ‡ Matt. x. 37.

|| Luke xiv. 26.

§ See Matt. v. 28. 1 Cor. vi. 9. vii. 1, 2. Gal. v. 19, etc.

It is upon these principles that some of the most noble examples of human excellence have been exhibited—those of men who have died for the testimony of a good conscience. If the strongest of our instincts—if that instinct, excited to its utmost vigor by the apprehension of a dreadful death, might be of weight to suspend the obligation of the moral law, it surely might have been suspended in the case of those who thus proved their fidelity.

Yet, obvious as is the propriety and the duty of thus preferring the Divine law before all, the dictates or the rights of nature are continually urged as of paramount obligation. Many persons appear to think that if a given action is dictated by the law of nature, it is quite sufficient. Respecting the instinct of self-preservation, especially, they appear to conclude that to whatever that instinct prompts, it is lawful to conform to its voice. They do not surely reflect upon the monstrousness of their opinions: they do not surely consider that they are absolutely superseding the moral law of God, and superseding it upon considerations resulting merely from the animal part of our constitution. The Divine laws respect the whole human economy—our prospects in another world as well as our existence in the present.

* Political Justice.

Some men, again, speak of our rights in a state of nature, as if to be in a state of nature was to be without the jurisdiction of the moral law. But if man be a moral and responsible agent, that law applies every where ; to a state of nature as truly as to every other state. If some other human being had been left with Selkirk on Juan Fernandez, and if that other seized an animal which Selkirk had ensnared, would Selkirk have been justified in asserting his natural right to the animal by whatever means ? It is very possible that no means would have availed to procure the restoration of the rabbit or the bird short of killing the offender. Might Selkirk kill the man in assertion of his natural rights ? Every one answers, No—because the unsophisticated dictates in every man's mind assure us that the rights of nature are subordinate to higher laws.

Situations similar to those of a state of nature sometimes arise in society ;* as where money is demanded, or violence is committed by one person on another, where no third person can be called in to assistance. The injured party, in such a case, cannot go to every length in his own cause by virtue of the law of nature: he can go only so far as the moral law allows. These considerations will be found peculiarly applicable to the rights of self-defence ; and it is pleasant to find these doctrines supported by that sceptical morality to which we just now referred. The author of Political Justice maintains that man possesses no rights ; that is, no absolute rights—none, of which the just exercise is not conditional upon the permission of a higher rule. That rule, with him, is “Justice”—with us it is the law of God ; but the reasoning is the same in kind.

Nevertheless, the natural rights of man ought to possess extensive application both in private and political affairs. If it were sufficiently remembered, that these rights are abstractedly possessed in equality by all men, we should find many imperative claims upon us with which we do not now comply. The artificial distinctions of society induce forgetfulness of the circumstance that we are all brethren : not that I would countenance the speculation of those who think that all men should be now practically equal ; but that these distinctions are such, that the general rights of nature are invaded in a degree which nothing can justify. There are natural claims of the poor upon the rich, of dependents upon their superiors, which are very commonly forgotten : there are endless acts of superciliousness, and unkindness, and oppression, in private life, which the law of nature emphatically condemns. When, sometimes, I see a man of fortune speaking in terms of supercilious command to his servant, I feel that he needs to go and learn some lessons of the law of nature. I feel that he has forgotten what he is, and what he is not, and what his brother is : he has forgotten that by nature he and his servant are in strictness equal ; and that although, by the permission of Providence, a various allotment is assigned to them now, he should regard every one with that consideration and respect which is due to a man and a brother. And when to these considerations are added those which result from the contemplation of our relationship to God—that we are the common objects of his bounty and his goodness, and that we are heirs to a common salvation, we are presented with such motives to pay attention to the rights of nature, as constitute an imperative obligation.

* See Locke on Gov. b. ii. c. 7.

The political duties which result from the law of nature, it is not our present business to investigate ; but it may be observed here, that a very limited appeal to facts is sufficient to evince, that by many political institutions the rights of nature have been grievously sacrificed ; and that if those rights had been sufficiently regarded, many of these vicious institutions would never have been exhibited in the world.

---

It appears worth while at the conclusion of this chapter to remark, that a person when he speaks of "Nature," should know distinctly what he means. The word carries with it a sort of indeterminate authority; and he who uses it amiss, may connect that authority with rules or actions which are little entitled to it. There are few senses in which the word is used, that do not refer, however obscurely, to God ; and it is for that reason that the notion of authority is connected with the word. "The very name of nature implies, that it must owe its birth to some prior agent, or, to speak properly, signifies in itself nothing."* Yet, unmeaning as the term is, it is one of which many persons are very fond ;—whether it be that their notions are really indistinct, or that some purposes are answered by referring to the obscurity of nature rather than to God. "Nature has decorated the earth with beauty and magnificence,"—"Nature has furnished us with joints and limbs,"—are phrases sufficiently unmeaning ; and yet I know not that they are likely to do any other harm than to give currency to the common fiction. But when it is said, that "Nature teaches us to adhere to truth,"—"Nature condemns us for dishonesty or deceit,"—"Men are taught by nature that they are responsible beings,"—there is considerable danger that we have both fallacious and injurious notions of the authority which thus teaches or condemns us. Upon this subject it were well to take the advice of Boyle : "Nature," he says, "is sometimes, indeed commonly, taken for a kind of semi-deity. In this sense it is best not to use it at all.”* It is dangerous to induce confusion into our ideas respecting our relationship with God.

* Milton : Christian Doct. p. 14.

A law of nature is a very imposing phrase ; and it might be supposed, from the language of some persons, that nature was an independent legislatress, who had sat and framed laws for the government of mankind. Nature is nothing ; yet it would seem that men do sometimes practically imagine, that a “law of nature” possesses proper and independent authority ; and it may be suspected that with some the notion is so palpable and strong, that they set up the authority of “the law of nature” without reference to the will of God, or perhaps in opposition to it. Even if notions like these float in the mind only with vapory indistinctness, a correspondent indistinctness of moral notions is likely to ensue. Every man should make to himself the rule, never to employ the word Nature when he speaks of ultimate moral authority. A law possesses no authority ; the authority rests only in the legislator : and as nature makes no laws, a law of nature involves no obligation but that which is imposed by the Divine will.

---

CHAPTER III.

UTILITY.

Obligations resulting from Expediency—Limits to these obligations.

THAT in estimating our duties in life we ought to pay regard to what is useful and beneficial—to what is likely to promote the welfare of ourselves and of others—can need little argument to prove. Yet, if it were required, it may be easily shown that this regard to utility is recommended or enforced in the expression of the Divine will. That will requires the exercise of pure and universal benevolence;—which benevolence is exercised in consulting the interests, the welfare, and the happiness of mankind. The dictates of utility, therefore, are frequently no other than the dictates of benevolence.

* Free Inquiry into the vulgarly received Notions of Nature.

Or, if we derive the obligations of utility from considerations connected with our reason, they do not appear much less distinct. To say that to consult utility is right, is almost the same as to say, it is right to exercise our understandings. The daily and hourly use of reason is to discover what is fit to be done; that is, what is useful and expedient; and since it is manifest that the Creator, in endowing us with the faculty, designed that we should exercise it, it is obvious that in this view also a reference to expediency is consistent with the Divine will.

When (higher laws being silent) a man judges that of two alternatives one is dictated by greater utility, that dictate constitutes an obligation upon him to prefer it. I should not hold a landowner innocent, who knowingly persisted in adopting a bad mode of raising corn; nor should I hold the person innocent who opposed an improvement in shipbuilding, or who obstructed the formation of a turnpike road that would benefit the public. These are questions, not of prudence merely, but of morals also.

Obligations resulting from utility possess great extent of application to political affairs. There are, indeed, some public concerns in which the moral law, antecedently, decides nothing. Whether a duty shall be imposed, or a charter granted, or a treaty signed, are questions which are perhaps to be determined by expediency alone : but when a public man is of the judgment that any given measure will tend to the general good, he is immoral if he opposes that measure. The immorality may indeed be made out by a somewhat different process :—such a man violates those duties of benevolence which religion imposes : he probably disregards, too, his sense of obligation ; for if he be of the judgment that a given measure will tend to the general good, conscience will scarcely be silent in whispering that he ought not to oppose it.

It is sufficiently evident, upon the principles which have hitherto been advanced, that considerations of utility are only so far obligatory as they are in accordance with the moral law. Pursuing, however, the method which has been adopted in the last two chapters, it may be observed, that this subserviency of utility to the Divine will, appears to be required by the written revelation. That habitual preference of futurity to the present time, which Scripture exhibits, indicates that our interests here should be held in subordination to our interests hereafter : and as these higher interests are to be consulted by the means which revelation prescribes, it is manifest that those means are to be pursued, whatever we may suppose to be their effects upon the present welfare of ourselves or of other men. “ If in this life only we have hope in God, then are we of all men most miserable.” It certainly is not, in the usual sense of the word, expedient to be most miserable. And why did they thus sacrifice expediency ? Because the communicated will of God required that course of life by which human interests were apparently sacrificed. It will be perceived that these considerations result from the truth, (too little regarded in talking of “ Expediency ” and “ General Benevolence ”) that utility, as it respects mankind, cannot be properly consulted without taking into account our interests in futurity. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," is a maxim of which all would approve if we had no concerns with another life. That which might be very expedient if death were annihilation, may be very inexpedient now.

"If ye say, We will not dwell in this land, neither obey the voice of the Lord your God, saying, No ; but we will go into the land of Egypt, where we shall see no war;" "nor have hunger of bread ; and there will we dwell ; it shall come to pass, that the sword, which ye feared, shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt; and the famine, where of ye were afraid, shall follow close after you there in Egypt : and there ye shall die."*—"We will burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and pour out drink-offerings unto her ; for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil. But since we left off, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword, and by the famine."—Therefore, "I will watch over them for evil, and not for good."† These reasoners argued upon the principle of making expediency the paramount law ; and it may be greatly doubted whether those who argue upon that principle now, have better foundation for their reasoning than those of old. Here was the prospect of advantage founded, as they thought, upon experience. One course of action had led (so they reasoned) to war and famine, and another to plenty, and health, and general well-being : yet still our Universal Lawgiver required them to disregard all these conclusions of expediency, and simply to conform to His will.

After all, the general experience is, that what is most expedient with respect to another world, is most expedient with respect to the present. There may be cases, and there have been, in which the Divine will may require an absolute renunciation of our present interests ; as the martyr who maintains his fidelity, sacrifices all possibility of advantage now. But these are unusual cases ; and the experience of the contrary is so general, that the truth has been reduced to a proverb. Perhaps in nineteen cases out of twenty, he best consults his present welfare, who endeavors to secure it in another world. “ By the wise contrivance of the author of nature, virtue is upon all ordinary occasions, even with regard to this life, real wisdom, and the surest and readiest means of obtaining both safety and advantage.”* Were it however, otherwise, the truth of our principles would not be shaken. Men’s happiness, and especially the happiness of good men, does not consist merely in external things. The promise of a hundred fold in this present life may still be fulfilled in mental felicity ; and if it could not be, who is the man that would exclude from his computations the prospect, in the world to come, of life everlasting ?

* Jer. xlii.

† Jer. xliv.

In the endeavor to produce the greatest sum of happiness, or which is the same thing, in applying the dictates of utility to our conduct in life, there is one species of utility that is deplorably disregarded, both in private and public affairs—that which respects the religious and moral welfare of mankind. If you hear a politician expatiating upon the good tendency of a measure, he tells you how greatly it will promote the interests of commerce, or how it will enrich a colony, or how it will propitiate a powerful party, or how it will injure a nation whom he dreads ; but you hear probably not one word of enquiry whether it will corrupt the character of those who execute the measure, or whether it will introduce vices into the colony, or whether it will present new temptations to the virtue of the public. And yet these considerations are perhaps by far the most important in the view even of enlightened expediency; for it is a desperate game to endeavor to benefit a people by means which may diminish their virtue. Even such a politician would probably assent to the unapplied proposition, "the virtue of a people is the best security for their welfare." It is the same in private life. You hear a parent who proposes to change his place of residence, or to engage in a new profession or pursuit, discussing the comparative conveniences of the proposed situation, the prospect of profit in the new profession, the pleasures which will result from the new pursuit; but you hear probably not one word of enquiry whether the change of residence will deprive his family of virtuous and beneficial society which will not be replaced—whether the contemplated profession will not tempt his own virtue or diminish his usefulness—or whether his children will not be exposed to circumstances that will probably taint the purity of their minds. And yet this parent will acknowledge, in general terms, that "nothing can compensate for the loss of religious and moral character." Such persons surely make very inaccurate computations of expediency.

* Dr. Smith : Theor. Mor. Sent.

As to the actual conduct of political affairs, men frequently legislate as if there was no such thing as religion or morality in the world; or as if, at any rate, religion and morality had no concern with affairs of state. I believe that a sort of shame (a false and vulgar shame no doubt) would be felt by many members of senates, in directly opposing religious or moral considerations to prospects of advantage. In our own country, those who are most willing to do this receive, from vulgar persons, a name of contempt for their absurdity! How inveterate must be the impurity of a system, which teaches men to regard as ridiculous that system which only is sound!

CHAPTER IV.

THE LAW OF NATIONS.—THE LAW OF HONOR.

Although the subjects of this chapter can scarcely be regarded as constituting rules of life, yet we are induced briefly to notice them in the present Essay, partly, on account of the importance of the affairs which they regulate, and partly, because they will afford satisfactory illustration of the principles of Morality.

SECTION I.

THE LAW OF NATIONS.

Obligations and authority of the Law of Nations—Its abuses, and the limits of its authority—Treaties.

The law of nations, so far as it is founded upon the principles of morality, partakes of that authority which those principles possess ; so far as it is founded merely upon the mutual conventions of states, it possesses that authority over the contracting parties which results from the rule, that men ought to abide by their engagements. The principal considerations which present themselves upon the subject, appear to be these :

1—That the law of nations is binding upon those states who knowingly allow themselves to be regarded as parties to it :

2—That it is wholly nugatory with respect to those states which are not parties to it :

3—That it is of no force in opposition to the moral law.

I. The obligation of the law of nations upon those who join in the convention, is plain—that is, it rests, generally, upon all civilized communities which have intercourse with one another. A tacit engagement only is, from the circumstances of the case, to be expected ; and if any state did not choose to conform to the law of nations, it should publicly express its dissent. The law of nations is not wont to tighten the bonds of morality ; so that probably most of its positive requisitions are enforced by the moral law : and this consideration should operate as an inducement to a conscientious fulfilment of these requisitions. In time of war, the law of nations prohibits poisoning and assassination, and it is manifestly imperative upon every state to forbear them : but whilst morality thus enforces many of the requisitions of the law of nations, that law frequently stops short, instead of following on to whither morality would conduct it. This distinction between assassination and some other modes of destruction that are practised in war, is not perhaps very accurately founded in considerations of morality : nevertheless, since the distinction is made, let it be made, and let it by all means be regarded. Men need not add arsenic and the private dagger to those modes of human destruction which war allows. The obligation to avoid private murder is clear, even though it were shown that the obligation extends much further. Whatever be the reasonableness of the distinction, and of the rule that is founded upon it, it is perfidious to violate that rule.

So it is with those maxims of the law of nations which require that prisoners should not be enslaved, and that the persons of ambassadors should be respected. Not that I think the man who sat down, with only the principles of morality before him, would easily be able to show, from those principles, that the slavery was wrong whilst other things which the law of nations allows are right—but that, as these principles actually enforce the maxims, as the observance of them is agreed on by civilized states, and as they tend to diminish the evils of war, it is imperative on states to observe them. Incoherent and inconsistent as the law of nations is, when it is examined by the moral law, it is pleasant to contemplate the good tendency of some of its requisitions. In 1702, previous to the declaration of war by this country (England), a number of the anticipated "enemy's" ships had been seized and detained. When the declaration was made, these vessels were released, "in pursuance," as the proclamation stated, "of the law of nations." Some of these vessels were perhaps shortly after captured, and irrecoverably lost to their owners: yet though it might perplex the Christian moralist to show that the release was right and that the capture was right too, still he may rejoice that men conform, even in part, to the purity of virtue.

Attempts to deduce the maxims of international law as they now obtain, from principles of morality, will always be in vain. Grotius seems as if he would countenance the attempt when he says, "Some writers have advanced a doctrine which can never be admitted, maintaining that the law of nations authorizes one power to commence hostilities against another, whose increasing greatness awakens her alarms. As a matter of expediency," says Grotius, "such a measure may be adopted; but the principles of justice can never be advanced in its favor."* Alas! if principles of justice are to decide what the law of nations shall authorize, it will be needful to establish a new code to-morrow. A great part of the code arises out of the conduct of war; and the usual practices of war are so foreign to principles of justice and morality, that it is to no purpose to attempt to found the code upon them. Nevertheless, let those who refer to the law of nations, introduce morality by all possible means; and if they think they cannot appeal to it always, let them appeal to it where they can. If they cannot persuade themselves to avoid hostilities when some injury is committed by another nation, let them avoid them when "another nation's greatness merely awakens their alarms."

* Rights of War and Peace.

II. That the law of nations is wholly nugatory with respect to those states which are not parties to it, is a truth which, however sound, has been too little regarded in the conduct of civilized nations. The state whose subjects discover and take possession of an uninhabited island, is entitled by the law of nations quietly to possess it. And it ought quietly to possess it; not that in the view of reason or of morality, the circumstance of an Englishman's first visiting the shores of a country, gives any very intelligible right to the King of England to possess it rather than any other prince, but that, such a rule having been agreed upon, it ought to be observed; but by whom? By those who are parties to the agreement. For which reason, the discoverer possesses no sufficient claim to oppose his right to that of a people who were not parties to it. So that he who, upon pretence of discovery, should forcibly exclude from a large extent of territory a people who knew nothing of European politics, and who in the view of reason possessed an equal or a greater right, undoubtedly violates the obligations of morality. It may serve to dispel the obscurity in which habit and self-interest wrap our perceptions, to consider, that amongst the states which were nearest to the newly-discovered land, a law of nations might exist which required that such land should be equally divided amongst them. Whose law of nations ought to prevail? That of European states, or that of states in the Pacific or South Sea? How happens it that the Englishman possesses a sounder right to exclude all other nations, than surrounding nations possess to partition it amongst them?

Unhappily, our law of nations goes much further; and by a monstrous abuse of power, has acted upon the same doctrine with respect to inhabited countries; for when these have been discovered, the law of nations has talked, with perfect coolness, of setting up a standard, and thenceforth assigning the territory to the nation whose subjects set it up; as if the previous inhabitants possessed no other claim or right than the bears and wolves. It has been asked (and asked with great reason,) what we should say to a canoe-full of Indians who should discover England, and take possession of it in the name of their chief?

Civilized states appear to have acted upon the maxim, that no people possess political rights but those who are parties to the law of nations; and accordingly the history of European settlements has been, so far as the aborigines were concerned, too much a history of outrage and treachery, and blood. Penn acted upon sounder principles; he perfectly well knew that neither an established practice, nor the law of nations, could impart a right to a country which was justly possessed by former inhabitants; and therefore, although Charles II. "granted" him Pennsylvania, he did not imagine that the gift of a man in London, could justify him in taking possession of a distant country without the occupiers' consent. What was "granted" therefore by his sovereign, he purchased of the owners; and the sellers were satisfied with their bargain and with him. The experience of Pennsylvania has shown that integrity is politic as well as right. When nations shall possess greater expansion of knowledge, and exercise greater purity of virtue, it will be found that many of the principles which regulate international intercourse, are foolish as well as vicious; that whilst they disregard the interests of morality they sacrifice their own.

III. Respecting the third consideration, that the law of nations is of no force in opposition to the moral law, little needs to be said here. It is evident that, upon whatever foundation the law of nations rests, its authority is subordinate to that of the will of God. When, therefore, we say that amongst civilized states, when an island is discovered by one state, other states are bound to refrain, it is not identical with saying that the discoverer is at liberty to keep possession by whatever means. The mode of asserting all rights is to be regulated in subordination to the moral law. Duplicity, and fraud, and violence, and bloodshed, may perhaps sometimes be the only means of availing ourselves of the rights which the law of nations grants; but it were a confused species of morality which should allow the commission of all this, because it is consistent with the law of nations.

A kindred remark applies to the obligation of treaties. Treaties do not oblige us to do what is morally wrong. A treaty is a string of engagements; but those engagements are no more exempt from the jurisdiction of the moral law, than the promise of a man to assassinate another. Does such a promise morally bind the ruffian? No: and for this reason, and for no other, that the performance is unlawful. And so it is with treaties. Two nations enter into a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance. Subsequently one of them engages in an unjust and profligate war. Does the treaty morally bind the other nation to abet the profligacy and injustice? No: if it did, any man might make any action lawful to himself by previously engaging to do it. No doubt such a nation and such a ruffian have done wrong; but their offence consisted in making the engagement, not in breaking it. Even if ordinary wars were defensible, treaties of offensive alliance that are unconditional with respect to time or objects, can never be justified. The state, however, which, in the pursuit of a temporary policy, has been weak enough, or vicious enough to make them, should not hesitate to refuse fulfilment, when the act of fulfilment is incompatible with the moral law. Such a state should decline to perform the treaty, and retire with shame—with shame, not that it has violated its engagements, but that it was ever so vicious as to make them.

---

SECTION II.

THE LAW OF HONOR.

Authority of the Law of Honor—Its character.

The law of honor consists of a set of maxims written or understood, by which persons of a certain class agree to regulate, or are expected to regulate, their conduct. It is evident that the obligation of the law of honor, as such, results exclusively from the agreement, tacit or expressed, of the parties concerned. It binds them because they have agreed to be bound, and for no other reason. He who does not choose to be ranked amongst the subjects of the law of honor, is under no obligation to obey its rules. These rules are precisely upon the same footing as the laws of free-masonry, or the regulations of a reading-room. He who does not choose to subscribe to the room, or to promise conformity to masonic laws, is under no obligation to regard the rules of either.

For which reason, it is very remarkable that at the commencement of his Moral Philosophy, Dr. Paley says, The rules of life “are, the law of honor, the law of the land, and the Scriptures." It were strange indeed, if that were a rule of life which every man is at liberty to disregard if he pleases; and which, in point of fact, nine persons out of ten do disregard without blame. Who would think of taxing the writer of these pages with violating a "rule of life," because he pays no attention to the law of honor? "The Scriptures" communicate the will of God; "the law of the land" is enforced by that will; but where is the sanction of the law of honor?—It is so much the more remarkable that this law should have been thus formally proposed as a rule of life, because, in the same work, it is described as "unauthorized." How can a set of unauthorized maxims compose a rule of life? But further: the author says that the law of honor is a "capricious rule, which abhors deceit, yet applauds the address of a successful intrigue"—And further still: "it allows of fornication, adultery, drunkenness, prodigality, duelling, and of revenge in the extreme." Surely then it cannot, with any propriety of language, be called a rule of life.

Placing, then, the obligation of the law of honor, as such, upon that which appears to be its proper basis—the duty to perform our lawful engagements—it may be concluded, that when a man goes to a gaming-house or a race-course, and loses his money by betting or playing, he is morally bound to pay: not because morality adjusts the rules of the billiard room or the turf, not because the law of the land sanctions the stake, but because the party previously promised to pay it. Nor would it affect this obligation, to allege that the stake was itself both illegal and immoral. So it was; but the payment is not. The payment of such a debt involves no breach of the moral law. The guilt consists not in paying the money, but in staking it. Nevertheless, there may be prior claims upon a man's property which he ought first to pay. Such are those of lawful creditors. The practice of paying debts of honor with promptitude, and of delaying the payment of other debts, argues confusion or depravity of principle. It is not honor, in any virtuous and rational sense of the word, which induces men to pay debts of honor instantly. Real honor would induce them to pay their lawful debts first: and indeed it may be suspected that the motive to the prompt payment of gaming debts, is usually no other than the desire to preserve a fair name with the world. Integrity of principle has often so little to do with it, that this principle is sacrificed in order to pay them.

With respect to those maxims of the law of honor which require conduct that the moral law forbids, it is quite manifest that they are utterly indefensible. "If unauthorized laws of honor be allowed to create exceptions to Divine prohibition, there is an end of all morality as founded in the will of the Deity, and the obligation of every duty may at one time or another be discharged." * These observations apply to those foolish maxims of honor which relate to dueling. These maxims can never justify the individual in disregarding the obligations of morality. He who acts upon them acts wickedly; unless indeed he be so little informed of the requisitions of morality, that he does not, upon this subject, perceive the distinction between right and wrong. The man of honor therefore should pay a gambling debt, but he should not send a challenge or accept it. The one is permitted by the moral law, the other is forbidden.

Whatever advantages may result from the law of honor, it is, as a system, both contemptible and bad. Even its advantages are of an ambiguous kind; for although it may prompt to rectitude of conduct, that conduct is not founded upon rectitude of principle. The motive is not so good as the act. And as to many of its particular rules, both positive and negative, they are the proper subject of reprobation and abhorrence. We ought to reprobate and abhor a system which enjoins the ferocious practice of challenges and duels, and which allows many of the most flagitious and degrading vices that infest the world.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. iii. c. 9.

---

ESSAY II.

PRIVATE RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS.

The division which has commonly been made of the private obligations of man, into those which respect himself, his neighbor, and his Creator, does not appear to be attended with any considerable advantages. These several obligations are indeed so involved the one with the other, that there are few personal duties which are not also in some degree relative, and there are no duties, either relative or personal, which may not be regarded as duties to God. The suicide's or the drunkard's vice injures his family or his friends: for every offence against morality is an injury to ourselves, and a violation of the duties which we owe to Him whose law is the foundation of morality. Neglecting, therefore, these minuter distinctions, we observe those only which separate the private from the political obligations of mankind.

CHAPTER I.

RELIGIOUS OBLIGATIONS.

Factitious semblances of devotion—Religious conversation—Sabbatical institutions—Non-sanctity of days—Of temporal employments: Travelling: Stage-coaches: "Sunday-papers:" Amusements—Holydays—Ceremonial institutions and devotional formularies—Utility of forms—Forms of prayer—Extempore prayer—Scepticism—Motives of Scepticism.

OF the two classes of religious obligations—that which respects the exercise of piety towards God, and that which respects visible testimonials of our reverence and devotion, the business of a work like this is principally with the latter. Yet at the risk of being charged with deviating from this proper business, I would adventure a few paragraphs respecting devotion of mind.

That the worship of our Father who is in heaven consists, not in assembling with others at an appointed place and hour ; not in joining in the rituals of a Christian church, or in performing ceremonies, or in participating of sacraments,* all men will agree ; because all men know that these things may be done whilst the mind is wholly intent upon other affairs, and even without any belief in the existence of God. “ Two attendances upon public worship is a form complied with by thousands who never kept a Sabbath in their lives.” † Devotion, it is evident, is an operation of the mind ; the sincere aspiration of a dependent and grateful being to Him who has all power both in heaven and in earth ; and as the exercise of devotion is not necessarily dependent upon external circumstances, it may be maintained in solitude or in society, in the place appropriated to worship or in the field, in the hour of business or of quietude and rest. Even under a less spiritual dispensation of old, a good man “ worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff.”

Now it is to be feared that some persons, who acknowledge that devotion is a mental exercise, impose upon themselves some feelings as devotional which are wholly foreign to the worship of God. There is a sort of spurious devotion—feelings, having the resemblance of worship, but not possessing its nature, and not producing its effects. “ Devotion,” says Blair, “ is a powerful principle, which penetrates the soul, which purifies the affections from debasing attachments, and by a fixed and steady regard to God, subdues every sinful passion, and forms the inclinations to piety and virtue.” ‡ To purify the affections and subdue the passions, is a serious operation ; it implies a sacrifice of inclination ; a subjugation of the will. This mental operation many persons are not willing to undergo ; and it is not therefore wonderful that some persons are willing to satisfy themselves with the exercise of a species of devotion that shall be attained at less cost.

*It is to be regretted that this word, of which the origin is so exceptionable, should be used to designate what are regarded as solemn acts of religion.

† Cowper's Letters.

‡ Sermons, No. 10.

A person goes to an oratorio of sacred music. The majestic flow of harmony, the exalted subjects of the hymns or anthems, the full and rapt assembly, excite, and warm, and agitate his mind ; sympathy becomes powerful ; he feels the stirring of unwonted emotions ; weeps, perhaps, or exults ; and when he leaves the assembly, persuades himself that he has been worshipping and glorifying God.

There are some preachers with whom it appears to be an object of much solicitude, to excite the hearer to a warm and impassioned state of feeling. By ardent declamation or passionate displays of the hopes and terrors of religion, they arouse and alarm his imagination. The hearer, who desires perhaps to experience the ardors of religion, cultivates the glowing sensations, abandons his mind to the impulse of feeling, and at length goes home in complacency with his religious sensibility, and glads himself with having felt the fervors of devotion.

Kindred illusion may be the result of calmer causes. The lofty and silent aisle of an ancient cathedral, the venerable ruins of some once honored abbey, the boundless expanse of the heaven of stars, the calm immensity of the still ocean, or the majesty and terror of a tempest, sometimes suffuses the mind with a sort of reverence and awe ; a sort of "philosophic transport," which a person would willingly hope is devotion of the heart.

It might be sufficient to assure us of the spuriousness of these semblances of religious feeling, to consider that emotions very similar in their nature are often excited by subjects which have no connection with religion. I know not whether the affecting scenes of the drama and of fictitious story, want much but association with ideas of religion to make them as devotional as those which have been noticed; and if, on the other hand, the feelings of him who attends an oratorio were excited by a military band, he would think not of the Deity or of heaven, but of armies and conquests. Nor should it be forgotten, that persons who have habitually little pretension to religion, are perhaps as capable of this factitious devotion as those in whom religion is constantly influential; and surely it is not to be imagined, that those who rarely direct reverend thoughts to their Creator, can suddenly adore Him for an hour and then forget him again, until some new excitement again arouses their raptures, to be again forgotten.

To religious feelings as to other things, the truth applies—"By their fruits ye shall know them." If these feelings do not tend to "purify the affections from debasing attachments;" if they do not tend to "form the inclinations to piety and virtue," they certainly are not devotional. Upon him whose mind is really prostrated in the presence of his God, the legitimate effect is, that he should be impressed with a more sensible consciousness of the Divine presence; that he should deviate with less facility from the path of duty; that his desires and thoughts should be reduced to Christian subjugation; that he should feel an influential addition to his dispositions to goodness; and that his affections should be expanded towards his fellow men. He who rises from the sensibilities of seeming devotion, and finds, that effects such as these are not produced in his mind, may rest assured that, in whatever he has been employed, it has not been in the pure worship of that God who is a spirit. To the real prostration of the soul in the Divine presence, it is necessary that the mind should be still:—"Be still and know that I am God." Such devotion is sufficient for the whole mind; it needs not—perhaps in its purest state it admits not—the intrusion of external things. And when the soul is thus permitted to enter as it were into the sanctuary of God; when it is humble in his presence; when all its desires are involved in the one desire of devotedness to him; then is the hour of acceptable worship—then the petition of the soul is prayer—then is its gratitude thanksgiving—then is its oblation praise.

That such devotion, when such is attainable, will have a powerful tendency to produce obedience to the moral law, may justly be expected: and here indeed is the true connection of the subject of these remarks with the general object of the present essays. Without real and efficient piety of mind, we are not to expect a consistent observance of the moral law. That law requires, sometimes, sacrifices of inclination and of interest, and a general subjugation of the passions, which religion, and religion only, can capacitate and induce us to make. I recommend not enthusiasm or fanaticism, but that sincere and reverent application of the soul to its Creator, which alone is likely to give either distinctness to our perceptions of his will, or efficiency to our motives to fulfill it.

---

A few sentences will be indulged to me here respecting religious conversation. I believe both that the proposition is true, and that it is expedient to set it down—that religious conversation is one of the banes of the religious world. There are many who are really attached to religion, and who sometimes feel its power, but who allow their better feelings to evaporate in an ebullition of words. They forget how much religion is an affair of the mind and how little of the tongue : they forget how possible it is to live under its power without talking of it to their friends ; and some, it is to be feared, may forget how possible it is to talk without feeling its influence. Not that the good man's piety is to live in his breast like an anchorite in his cell. The evil does not consist in speaking of religion, but in speaking too much ; not in manifesting our allegiance to God ; not in encouraging by exhortation, and amending by our advice ; not in placing the light upon a candlestick—but in making religion a common topic of discourse. Of all species of well intended religious conversation, that perhaps is the most exceptionable which consists in narrating our own religious feelings. Many thus intrude upon that religious quietude which is peculiarly favorable to the Christian character. The habit of communicating "experiences" I believe is to be very prejudicial to the mind. It may sometimes be right to do this : in the great majority of instances I believe it is not beneficial, and not right. Men thus dissipate religious impressions, and therefore diminish their effects. Such observation as I have been enabled to make, has sufficed to convince me that, where the religious character is solid, there is but little religious talk ; and that, where there is much talk, the religious character is superficial, and, like other superficial things, is easily destroyed. And if these be the attendants, and in part the consequences of general religious conversation, how peculiarly dangerous must that conversation be, which exposes those impressions that perhaps were designed exclusively for ourselves, and the use of which may be frustrated by communicating them to others. Our solicitude should be directed to the invigoration of the religious character in our own minds ; and we should be anxious that the plant of piety, if it had fewer branches might have a deeper root.

SABBATICAL INSTITUTIONS.

“ Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is.”* The Divinely authorized institution of Moses respecting a weekly Sabbath, and the practice of the first teachers of Christianity, constitute a sufficient recommendation to set apart certain times for the exercise of public worship, even were there no injunctions such as that which is placed at the head of this paragraph. It is, besides, manifestly proper, that beings who are dependent upon God for all things, and especially for their hopes of immortality, should devote a portion of their time to the expression of their gratitude, and submission, and reverence. Community of dependence and of hope dictates the propriety of united worship ; and worship to be united, must be performed at times previously fixed.

From the duty of observing the Hebrew Sabbath, we are sufficiently exempted by the fact, that it was actually not observed by the apostles of Christ. The early Christians met, not on the last day of the week, but on the first. Whatever reason may be assigned as a motive for this rejection of the ancient Sabbath, I think it will tend to discountenance the observance of any day, as such : for if that day did not possess perpetual sanctity, what day does possess it ?

And with respect to the general tenor of the Christian Scriptures as to the sanctity of particular days, it is I think manifestly adverse to the opinion that one day is obligatory rather than another. “ Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new-moon or of the Sabbath-days ; which are a shadow of things to come ; but the body is of Christ.”* Although this “Sabbath-day” was that of the Jews, yet the passage indicates the writer’s sentiments, generally, respecting the sanctity of specific days : he classes them with matters which all agree to be unimportant ;—with meats, and drinks, and new-moons ; and pronounces them to be alike “shadows.” That strong passage addressed to the Christians of Galatia is of the same import : “How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage ? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain.”† That which, in writing to the Christians of Colosse, the apostle called “shadows,” he now, in writing to those of Galatia, calls “beggarly elements.” The obvious tendency is to discredit the observance of particular times ; and if he designed to except the first day of the week, it is not probable that he would have failed to except it.

* Heb. x. 25.

Nevertheless, the question whether we are obliged to observe the first day of the week because it is the first, is one point—whether we ought to devote it to religious exercises, seeing that it is actually set apart for the purpose, is another. The early Christians met on that day, and their example has been followed in succeeding times ; but if for any sufficient reason, (and such reasons, however unlikely to arise, are yet conceivable,) the Christian world should fix upon another day of the week instead of the first, I perceive no grounds upon which the arrangement could be objected to. As there is no sanctity in any day, and no obligation to appropriate one day rather than another, that which is actually fixed upon is the best and the right one. Bearing in mind, then, that it is right to devote some portion of our time to religious exercises, and that no objection exists to the day which is actually appropriated, the duty seems very obvious—so to employ it.

* Col. ii. 16, 17. In Rom. xiv. 5, 6, there is a parallel passage.

† Gal. iv. 9, 10, 11.

Cessation from labor on the first day of the week, is nowhere enjoined in the Christian Scriptures. Upon this subject, the principles on which a person should regulate his conduct appear to be these: He should reflect that the whole of the day is not too large a portion of our time to devote to public worship, to religious recollection, and sedateness of mind; and therefore that occupations which would interfere with this sedateness and recollection, or with public worship, ought to be foreborne. Even if he supposed that the devoting of the whole of the day was not necessary for himself, he should reflect, that since a considerable part of mankind are obliged, from various causes, to attend to matters unconnected with religion during a part of the day, and that one set attends to them during one part and another during another—the whole of the day is necessary for the community, even though it were not for each individual: and if every individual should attend to his ordinary affairs during that portion of the day which he deemed superabundant, the consequence might soon be that the day would not be devoted to religion at all.

These views will enable the reader to judge in what manner we should decide questions respecting attention to temporal affairs on particular occasions. The day is not sacred, therefore business is not necessarily sinful; the day ought to be devoted to religion, therefore other concerns which are not necessary are generally, wrong. The remonstrance, “Which of you shall have an ass, or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath-day?” sufficiently indicates that, when reasonable calls are made upon us, we are at liberty to attend to them. Of the reasonableness of these calls every man must endeavor to judge for himself. A tradesman ought, as a general rule, to refuse to buy or sell goods. If I sold clothing, I would furnish a surtout to a man who was suddenly summoned on a journey, but not to a man who could call the next morning. Were I a builder, I would prop a falling wall, but not proceed in the erection of a house. Were I a lawyer, I would deliver an opinion to an applicant to whom the delay of a day would be a serious injury, but not to save him the expense of an extra night's lodging by waiting. The medical profession, and those who sell medicine, are differently situated, yet it is not to be doubted that both, and especially the latter, might devote a smaller portion of the day to their secular employments, if earnestness in religious concerns were as great as the opportunities to attend to them. Some physicians in extensive practice, attend almost as regularly on public worship as any of their neighbors. Excursions of pleasure on this day are rarely defensible; they do not comport with the purposes to which the day is appropriated. To attempt specific rules upon such a subject were, however, vain. Not every thing which partakes of relaxation is unallowable. A walk in the country may be proper and right, when a party to a watering place would be improper and wrong.* There will be little difficulty in determining what it is allowable to do and what it is not, if the enquiry be not, how much secularity does religion allow? but, how much can I, without a neglect of duty, avoid?

* The scrupulousness of the "Puritans" in the reign of Charles I., and the laxity of Laud, whose ordinances enjoined sports after the hours of public worship, were both really, though perhaps not equally, improper. The Puritans attached sanctity to the day; and Laud did not consider, or did not regard the consideration, that his sports would not only discredit the notion of sanctity, but preclude that recollectedness of mind which ought to be maintained throughout the whole day.

The habit which obtains with many persons of travelling on this day, is peculiarly indefensible; because it not only keeps the traveller from his church or meeting, but keeps away his servants, or the postmen on the road, and ostlers, and cooks, and waiters. All these may be detained from public worship by one man's journey of fifty miles. Such a man incurs some responsibility. The plea of "saving time" is not remote from irreverence; for if it has any meaning it is this, that our time is of more value when employed in business, than when employed in the worship of God. It is discreditable to this country that the number of carriages which traverse it on this day is so great. The evil may rightly and perhaps easily be regulated by the Legislature. You talk of difficulties:—you would have talked of many more, if it were now, for the first time, proposed to shut up the general post-office one day in seven. We should have heard of parents dying before their children could hear of their danger: of bills dishonored and merchants discredited for want of a post; and of a multitude of other inconveniences which busy anticipation would have discovered. Yet the general post-office is shut; and where is the evil?

A similar regulation would be desirable with respect to "Sunday Papers." The ordinary contents of a newspaper are little accordant with religious sobriety and abstraction from the world. News of armies, and of funds and markets, of political contests and party animosities, of robberies and trials, of sporting, and boxing, and the stage; with merriment, and scandal, and advertisements—are sufficiently ill adapted to the cultivation of religiousness of mind.

Private, and especially public amusements on this day, are clearly wrong. It is remarkable that they appear least willing to dispense with their amusements on this day, who pursue them on every other ; and the observation affords one illustration amongst the many of the pitiable effects of what is called—though it is only called—a life of pleasure.

Upon every kind and mode of negligence respecting these religious obligations, the question is not simply, whether the individual himself sustains moral injury, but also whether he occasions injury to those around him. The example is mischievous. Even supposing that a man may feel devotion in his counting-house, or at the tavern, or over a pack of cards, his neighbors who know where he is, or his family who see what he is doing, are encouraged to follow his example, without any idea of carrying their religion with them. “My neighbor amuses himself—my father attends to his ledgers—and why may not I?”—So that, if such things were not intrinsically unlawful, they would be wrong because they are inexpedient. Some things might be done without blame by the lone tenant of a wild, which involve positive guilt in a man in society.

Holydays, such as those which are distinguished by the names of Christmas-day and Good-Friday, possess no sanction from Scripture : they are of human institution. If any religious community thinks it is desirable to devote more than fifty-two days in the year to the purposes of religion, it is unquestionably right that they should devote them ; and it is amongst the good institutions of several Christian communities, that they do weekly appropriate some additional hours to these purposes. The observance of the days in question is however of another kind ; here the observance refers to the day as such ; and I know not how the censure can be avoided which was directed to those Galatians who “observed days, and months, and times, and years.” Whatever may be the sentiments of enlightened men, those who are not enlightened are likely to regard such days as sacred in themselves. This is turning to beggarly elements : this partakes of the character of superstition ; and superstition of every kind and in every degree, is incongruous with that "glorious liberty" which Christianity describes, and to which it would conduct us.

CEREMONIAL INSTITUTIONS AND DEVOTIONAL FORMULARIES.

If God has made known his will that any given ceremony shall be performed in his church, that expression is sufficient ; we do not then enquire into the reasonableness of the ceremony, nor into its utility. There is nothing in the act of sprinkling water in an infant's face, or of immersing the person of an adult, which recommends it to the view of reason, any more than twenty other acts which might be performed : yet, if it be clear that such an act is required by the Divine will, all further controversy is at an end. It is not the business, any more than it is the desire, of the writer here to enquire whether the Deity has thus expressed his will respecting any of the rites which are adopted in some Christian churches ; yet the reader should carefully bear in mind what it is that constitutes the obligation of a rite or ceremony, and what does not. Setting utility aside, the obligation must be constituted by an expression of the Divine will : and he who enquires into the obligation of these things, should reflect that they acquire a sort of adventitious sanctity from the power of association. Being connected from early life with his ideas of religion, he learns to attach to them the authority which he attaches to religion itself ; and thus perhaps he scarcely knows, because he does not enquire, whether a given institution is founded upon the law of God, or introduced by the authority of men.

Of some ceremonies or rites, and of almost all formularies and other appendages of public worship, it is acknowledged that they possess no proper sanction from the will of God. Supposing the written expression of that will to contain nothing by which we can judge either of their propriety or impropriety, the standard to which they are to be referred is that of utility alone.

Now, it is highly probable that benefits result from these adjuncts of religion, because, in the present state of mankind, it may be expected that some persons are impressed with useful sentiments respecting religion through the intervention of these adjuncts, who might otherwise scarcely regard religion at all: it is probable that many are induced to attend upon public worship by the attraction of its appendages, who would otherwise stay away. Simply to be present at the font or the communion table, may be a means of inducing many religious considerations into the mind. And as to those who are attracted to public worship by its accompaniments, they may at least be in the way of religious benefit. One goes to hear the singing, and one the organ, and one to see the paintings or the architecture; a still larger number go because they are sure to find some occupation for their thoughts; some prayers or other offices of devotion, something to hear, and see, and do. "The transitions from one office of devotion to another, from confession to prayer, from prayer to thanksgiving, from thanksgiving to 'hearing of the word,' are contrived, like scenes in the drama, to supply the mind with a succession of diversified engagements."* These diversified engagements, I say, attract some who would not otherwise attend; and it is better that they should go from imperfect motives than that they should not go at all. It must, however, be confessed, that the groundwork of this species of utility is similar to that which has been urged in favor of the use of images by the Romish Church. "Idols," say they, "are laymen's books; and a great means to stir up pious thoughts and devotion in the learnedest."* Indeed, if it is once admitted that the prospect of advantage is a sufficient reason for introducing objects addressed to the senses into the public offices of worship, it is not easy to define where we shall stop. If we may have magnificent architecture, and music, and chanting, and paintings, why may we not have the yet more imposing pomp of the Catholic worship? I do not say that this pomp is useful and right, but that the principle on which such things are introduced into the worship of God furnishes no satisfactory means of deciding what amount of external observances should be introduced, and what should not. If figures on canvas are lawful because they are useful, why is not a figure in marble or in wood? Why may we not have images by way of laymen's books, and of stirring up pious thoughts and devotion?

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 5, c. 5.

But it is to be apprehended of such things, or of "contrivances like scenes in a drama," that they have much less tendency to promote devotion than some men may suppose. No doubt they may possess an imposing effect, they may powerfully interest and affect the imagination; but does not this partake too much of that factitious devotion of which we speak? Is it certain that such things have much tendency to purify the mind, and raise up within it a power that shall efficiently resist temptation?

Even if some benefits do result from the employment of these appendages of worship, they are not without their dangers and their evils. With respect to those which are addressed to the senses, whether to the eye or ear, there is obviously a danger that like other sensible objects they will withdraw the mind from its proper business—the cultivation of pure religious affections towards God. And respecting the formularies of devotion, it has been said by a writer, whom none will suspect of overstating their evils, “The arrogant man, as if like the dervise in the Persian fable, he had shot his soul into the character he assumes, repeats, with complete self-application, Lord, I am not high-minded: the trifler says, I hate vain thoughts: the irreligious, Lord, how I love thy law: he who seldom prays at all, confidently repeats, All the day long I am occupied in thy statutes.* These are not light considerations: here is insincerity and untruths; and insincerity and untruths, it should be remembered, in the place and at the time when we profess to be humbled in the presence of God. The evils too are inseparable from the system. Wherever preconcerted formularies are introduced, there will always be some persons who join in the use of them without propriety, or sincerity or decorum. Nor are the evils much extenuated by the hope which has been suggested, that “the holy vehicle of their hypocrisy may be made that of their conversion.” It is very Christian-like to indulge this hope, though I fear it is not very reasonable. Hypocrisy is itself an offence against God; and it can scarcely be expected that anything so immediately connected with the offence will often effect such an end.

* Milton's Prose Works, v. 4, p. 266.

It is not, however, in the case of those who use these forms in a manner positively hypocritical, that the greatest evil and danger consists: “There is a kind of mechanical memory in the tongue, which runs over the form without any aid of the understanding, without any concurrence of the will, without any consent of the affections; for do we not sometimes implore God to hear a prayer to which we are ourselves not attending?"* We have sufficient reason for knowing that to draw nigh to God with our lips whilst our hearts are far from him, is a serious offence in his sight; and when it is considered how powerful is the tendency of oft-repeated words to lose their practical connection with feelings and ideas, it is to be feared that this class of evils, resulting from the use of forms, is of very wide extent. Nor is it to be forgotten, that as even religious persons sometimes employ "the form without any aid of the understanding," so others are in danger of substituting the form for the reality, and of imagining that, if they are exemplary in the observance of the externals of devotion, the work of religion is done.

* More’s Moral Sketches, 3d Ed. p. 429.

Such circumstances may reasonably make us hesitate in deciding the question of the propriety of these external things, as a question of expediency. They may reasonably make us do more than this; for does Christianity allow us to invent a system, of which some of the consequences are so bad, for the sake of a beneficial end?

Forms of prayer have been supposed to rest on an authority somewhat more definite than that of other religious forms. "The Lord's Prayer is a precedent, as well as a pattern, for forms of prayer. Our Lord appears, if not to have prescribed, at least to have authorized the use of fixed forms, when he complied with the request of the disciple who said unto him, 'Lord teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.'"† If we turn to Matt. vi., where the fullest account is given of the subject, we are, I think, presented with a different view. Our Saviour, who had been instituting his more perfect laws in place of the doctrines which had been taught of old time, proceeded to the prevalent mode of giving alms, of praying, of fasting, and of laying up wealth. He first describes these modes, and then directs in what manner Christians ought to give alms, and pray and fast. Now, if it be contended that he requires us to employ that particular form of prayer which he then dictated, it must also be contended that he requires us to adopt that particular mode of giving money which he described, and those particular actions, when fasting, which he mentions. If we are obliged to use the form of prayer, we are obliged to give money in secret; and when we fast to put oil upon our heads. If these particular modes were not enjoined, neither is the form of prayer; and the Scriptures contain no indication that this form was ever used at all, either by the apostles or their converts. But if the argument only asserts that fixed forms are "authorized" by the language of Christ, the question becomes a question merely of expediency. Supposing that they are authorized, they are to be employed only if they are useful. Even in this view, it may be remarked that there is no reason to suppose, from the Christian Scriptures, that either Christ himself or his apostles ever used a fixed form. If he had designed to authorize, and therefore to recommend their adoption, is it not probable that some indications of their having been employed would be presented? But instead of this, we find that every prayer which is recorded in the volume was delivered extempore, upon the then occasion, and arising out of the then existing circumstances.

* More's Moral Sketches, 3d Ed. p. 327.

† Mor. and Pol. Phil. p. 3. b. 5. c. 5.

Yet after all, the important question is not between preconcerted and extempore prayer as such, but whether any prayer is proper and right but that which is elicited by the influence of the Divine power. The enquiry into this solemn subject would lead us too wide from our general business. The truth, however, that “we know not what to pray for as we ought,” is as truly applicable to extempore as to formal prayer. Words merely do not constitute prayer, whether they be prepared beforehand, or conceived at the moment they are addressed. There is reason to believe that he only offers perfectly acceptable supplications, who offers them “according to the will of God,” and “of the ability which God giveth :”—and if such be indeed the truth, it is scarcely compatible either with a prescribed form of words, or with extempore prayer at prescribed times.—Yet if any Christian, in the piety of his heart, believes it to be most conducive to his religious interests to pray at stated times or in fixed forms, far be it from me to censure this the mode of his devotion, or to assume that his petition will not obtain access to the Universal Lord.

Finally, respecting uncommanded ceremonials and rituals of all kinds, and respecting all the appendages of public worship which have been adopted as helps to devotion, there is one truth to which perhaps every good man will assent—that if religion possessed its sufficient and rightful influence, if devotion of the heart were duly maintained without these things, they would no longer be needed. He who enjoys the vigorous exercise of his limbs, is encumbered by the employment of a crutch. Whether the Christian world is yet prepared for the relinquishment of these appendages and “helps”—whether an equal degree of efficacious religion would be maintained without them—are questions which I presume not to determine: but it may nevertheless be decided, that this is the state of the Christian church to which we should direct our hopes and our endeavors—and that Christianity will never possess its proper influence, and will not effect its des-ted objects, until the internal dedication of the heart is universally attained.

---

To those who may sometimes be brought into contact with persons who profess scepticism respecting Christianity, and especially to those who are conscious of any tendency in their own minds to listen to the objections of these persons, it may be useful to observe, that the grounds upon which sceptics build their disbelief of Christianity, are commonly very slight. The number is comparatively few whose opinions are the result of any tolerable degree of investigation. They embraced sceptical notions through the means which they now take of diffusing them amongst others—not by arguments but jests ; not by objections to the historical evidence of Christianity, but by conceits and witticisms ; not by examining the nature of religion as it was delivered by its Founder, but by exposing the conduct of those who profess it. Perhaps the seeming paradox is true, that no men are so credulous, that no men accept important propositions upon such slender evidence, as the majority of those who reject Christianity. To believe that the religious opinions of almost all the civilized world are founded upon imposture, is to believe an important proposition ; a proposition which no man, who properly employs his faculties, would believe without considerable weight of evidence. But what is the evidence upon which the “ unfledged wtlings who essay their wanton efforts ” against religion, usually found their notions? Alas ! they are so far from having rejected Christianity upon the examination of its evidences that they do not know what Christianity is. To disbelieve the religion of Christianity upon grounds which shall be creditable to the understanding, involves no light task. A man must investigate and scrutinize ; he must examine the credibility of testimony ; he must weigh and compare evidence ; he must enquire into the reality of historical facts. If, after rationally doing all this, he disbelieves in Christianity—be it so. I think him, doubtless, mistaken, but I do not think him puerile and credulous. But he who professes scepticism without any of this species of enquiry, is credulous and puerile indeed ; and such most sceptics actually are. “ Concerning unbelievers and doubters of every class, one observation may almost universally be made with truth, that they are little acquainted with the nature of the Christian religion, and still less with the evidence by which it is supported.”* In France, scepticism has extended itself as widely perhaps as in any country in the world, and its philosophers forty or fifty years ago, were ranked amongst the most intelligent and sagacious of mankind. And upon what grounds did these men reject Christianity? Dr. Priestley went with Lord Shelburne to France, and he says, “ I had an opportunity of seeing and conversing with every person of eminence wherever we came :” I found “ all the philosophical persons to whom I was introduced at Paris, unbelievers in Christianity, and even professed atheists. As I chose on all occasions to appear as a Christian, I was told by some of them that I was the only person they had ever met with, of whose understanding they had any opinion, who professed to believe in Christianity. But on interrogating them on the subject, I soon found that they had given no proper attention to it, and did not really know what Christianity was. This was also the case with a great part of the company that I saw at Lord Shelburne’s.”† If these philosophical men rejected Christianity in such contemptible and shameful ignorance of its nature and evidences, upon what grounds are we to suppose the ordinary striplings of infidelity reject it?

* Gisborne’s Duties of Men.

† Memoirs of Dr. Priestley.

How then does it happen that those who affect scepticism are so ambitious to make their scepticism known? Because it is a short and easy road to distinction; because it affords a cheap means of gratifying vanity. To "rise above vulgar prejudices and superstitions"—"to entertain enlarged and liberal opinions," are phrases of great attraction, especially to young men; and how shall they show that they rise above vulgar prejudices, how shall they so easily manifest the enlargement of their views, as by rejecting a system which all their neighbors agree to be true? They feel important to themselves, and that they are objects of curiosity to others: and they are objects of curiosity, not on account of their own qualities, but on account of the greatness of that which they contemn. The peasant who reviles a peasant, may revile him without an auditor, but a province will listen to him who vilifies a king. I know not that an intelligent person should be advised to reason with these puny assailants: their notions and their conduct are not the result of reasoning. What they need is the humiliation of vanity and the exposure of folly. A few simple interrogations would expose their folly; and for the purposes of humiliation, simply pass them by. The sun that shines upon them, makes them look bright and large. Let reason and truth withdraw their rays, and these seeming stars will quickly set in silence and in darkness.

More contemptible motives to the profession of infidelity cannot perhaps exist, but there are some which are more detestable. Hartley says that "the strictness and purity of the Christian religion in respect to sexual licentiousness, is probably the chief thing which makes vicious men first fear and hate, and then vilify and oppose it.”*

Whether therefore we regard the motives which lead to scepticism, or the reasonableness of the grounds upon which it is commonly founded, there is surely much reason for an ingenuous young person to hold in contempt the jests, and pleasantries, and sophistries respecting revelation with which he may be assailed.

---

CHAPTER II.

PROPERTY.

Foundation of the Right to Property—Insolvency : Perpetual obligation to pay debts : Reform of public opinion : Examples of integrity—Wills, Legatees, Heirs : Informal Wills : Intestates—Minor's debts—A Wife's debts—Bills of Exchange—Unjust defendants—Privateers—Confiscations—Insurance—Settlements—Houses of infamy—Literary property—Rewards.

DISQUISITIONS respecting the origin of property appear to be of little use ; partly because the origin can scarcely be determined, and partly because, if it could be determined, the discovery would be little applicable to the present condition of human affairs. In whatever manner an estate was acquired two thousand years ago, it is of no consequence in enquiring who ought to possess it now.

The foundation of the right to property is a more important point. Ordinarily, the foundation is the law of the land. Of civil government—which institution is sanctioned by the Divine will—one of the great offices is, to regulate the distribution of property ; to give it, if it has the power of giving ; or to decide between opposing claimants, to whom it shall be assigned.

* Observations on Man.

The proposition therefore, as a general rule, is sound;—He possesses a right to property to whom the law of the land assigns it. This however is only a general rule. It has been sufficiently seen that some legal possessions are not permitted by the moral law. The occasional opposition between the moral and the legal right to property, is inseparable from the principle on which law is founded—that of acting upon general rules. It is impossible to frame any rule, the application of which shall, in every variety of circumstances, effect the requisitions of Christian morality. A rule which in nine cases proves equitable, may prove utterly unjust in the tenth. A rule which in nine cases promotes the welfare of the citizen, may in the tenth outrage reason and humanity.

It is evident that in the present state of legal institutions, the evils which result from laws respecting property must be prevented, if they are prevented at all, by the exercise of virtue in individuals. If the law assigns a hundred pounds to me, which every upright man perceives ought in equity to have been assigned to another, that other has no means of enforcing his claim. Either therefore the claim of equity must be disregarded, or I must voluntarily satisfy it.

There are many cases connected with the acquisition or retention of property, with which the decisions of law are not immediately connected, but respecting which it is needful to exercise a careful discrimination, in order to conform to the requisitions of Christian rectitude. The whole subject is of great interest, and of extensive practical application in the intercourse of life. The reader will therefore be presented with several miscellaneous examples, in which the moral law appears to require greater purity of rectitude than is required by statutes, or than is ordinarily practised by mankind.

INSOLVENCY.—Why is a man obliged to pay his debts? It is to be hoped that the morality of few persons is lax enough to reply—Because the law compels him. But why, then, is he obliged to pay them? Because the moral law requires it. That this is the primary ground of the obligation is evident; otherwise the payment of any debt which a vicious or corrupt legislature resolved to cancel, would cease to be obligatory upon the debtor. The Virginian statute, which we noticed in the last Essay, would have been a sufficient justification to the planters to defraud their creditors.

A man becomes insolvent and is made a bankrupt: he pays his creditors ten shillings instead of twenty, and obtains his certificate. The law, therefore, discharges him from the obligation to pay more. The bankrupt receives a large legacy, or he engages in business and acquires property. Being then able to pay the remainder of his debts, does the legal discharge exempt him from the obligation to pay them? No: and for this reason that the legal discharge is not a moral discharge; that as the duty to pay at all was not founded primarily on the law, the law cannot warrant him in withholding a part.

It is however said, that the creditors have relinquished their right to the remainder by signing the certificate. But why did they accept half their demands instead of the whole? Because they were obliged to do it; they could get no more. As to granting the certificate, they do it because to withhold it would be only an act of gratuitous unkindness. It would be preposterous to say that creditors relinquish their claims voluntarily; for no one would give up his claim to twenty shillings on the receipt of ten if he could get the other ten by refusing. It might as reasonably be said that a man parts with a limb voluntarily, because, having incurably lacerated it, he submits to an amputation. It is to be remembered, too, that the necessary relinquishment of half the demand is occasioned by the debtor himself : and it seems very manifest that when a man, by his own act, deprives another of his property, he cannot allege the consequences of that act as a justification of withholding it after restoration is in his power.

The mode in which an insolvent man obtains a discharge, does not appear to affect his subsequent duties. Compositions, and bankruptcies, and discharges by an insolvent act are in this respect alike. The acceptance of a part instead of the whole is not voluntary in either case ; and neither case exempts the debtor from the obligation to pay in full if he can.

If it should be urged that when a person intrusts property to another, he knowingly undertakes the risk of that other's insolvency, and that, if the contingent loss happens, he has no claims to justice on the other, the answer is this ; that whatever may be thought of these claims, they are not the grounds upon which the debtor is obliged to pay. The debtor always engages to pay, and the engagement is enforced by morality ; the engagement therefore is binding, whatever risk another man may incur by relying upon it. The causes which have occasioned a person's insolvency, although they greatly affect his character, do not affect his obligations : the duty to repay when he has the power, is the same whether the insolvency were occasioned by his fault or his misfortune. In all cases, the reasoning that applies to the debt, applies also to the interest that accrues upon it ; although with respect to the acceptance of both, and especially of interest, a creditor should exercise a considerate discretion.—A man who has failed of paying his debts ought always to live with frugality, and carefully to economize such money as he gains. He should reflect that he is a trustee for his creditors, and that all the needless money which he expends is not his but theirs.

The amount of property which the trading part of a commercial nation loses by insolvency, is great enough to constitute a considerable national evil. The fraud, too, that is practised under cover of insolvency, is doubtless the most extensive of all species of private robbery. The profligacy of some of these cases is well known to be extreme. He who is a bankrupt to-day, riots in the luxuries of affluence to-morrow; bows to the creditors whose money he is spending, and exults in the success and the impunity of his wickedness. Of such conduct we should not speak or think but with detestation. We should no more sit at the table, or take the hand of such a man, than if we knew he had got his money last night on the highway. There is a wickedness in some bankruptcies to which the guilt of ordinary robbers approaches but at a distance. Happy, if such wickedness could not be practised with legal impunity!* Happy, if public opinion supplied the deficiency of the law and held the iniquity in rightful abhorrence! †

Perhaps nothing would tend so efficaciously to diminish the general evils of insolvency, as a sound state of public opinion respecting the obligation to pay our debts. The insolvent who, with the means of paying, retains the money in his own pocket, is, and he should be regarded as being, a dishonest man. If public opinion held such conduct to be of the same character as theft, probably a more powerful motive to avoid insolvency would be established than any which now exists. Who would not anxiously (and therefore, in almost all cases, successfully) struggle against insolvency, when he knew that it would be followed, if not by permanent poverty; by permanent disgrace? If it should be said that to act upon such a system would overwhelm an insolvent's energies, keep him in perpetual inactivity, and deprive his family of the benefit of his exertions—I answer, that the evil, supposing it to impend, would be much less extensive than may be imagined. The calamity being foreseen, would prevent men from becoming insolvent; and it is certain that the majority might have avoided insolvency by sufficient care. Besides, if a man's principles are such that he would rather sink into inactivity than exert himself in order to be just, it is not necessary to mould public opinion to his character. The question too is, not whether some men would not prefer indolence to the calls of justice, but whether the public should judge accurately respecting what those calls are. The state, and especially a family, might lose occasionally by this reform of opinion—and so they do by sending a man to New South Wales; but who would think this a good reason for setting criminals at large? And after all, much more would be gained by preventing insolvency, than lost by the ill consequences upon the few who failed to pay their debts.

* See the 3d Essay.

† Id.

It is cause of satisfaction that, respecting this rectified state of opinion, and respecting integrity of private virtue, some examples are offered. There is one community of Christians which holds its members obliged to pay their debts whenever they possess the ability, without regard to the legal discharge.* By this means, there is thrown over the character of every bankrupt who possesses property, a shade which nothing but payment can dispel. The effect (in conjunction we may hope with private integrity of principle) is good—good, both in instituting a new motive to avoid insolvency and in inducing some of those who do become insolvent, subsequently to pay all their debts.

* “Where any have injured others in their property, the greatest frugality should be observed by themselves and their families; and although they may have a legal discharge from their creditors, both equity and our Christian profession demand, that none, when they have it in their power, should rest satisfied until a just restitution be made to those who have suffered by them.”

“And it is the judgment of this meeting, that monthly and

Of this latter effect many honorable instances might be given : two of which having fallen under my observation, I would briefly mention.—A man had become insolvent, I believe in early life ; his creditors divided his property amongst them, and gave him a legal discharge. He appears to have formed the resolution to pay the remainder, if his own exertions should enable him to do it. He procured employment, by which however he never gained more than twenty shillings a week ; and worked industriously and lived frugally for eighteen years. At the expiration of this time, he found he had accumulated enough to pay the remainder, and he sent the money to his creditors. Such a man, I think, might hope to derive, during the remainder of his life, greater satisfaction from the consciousness of integrity, than he would have derived from expending the money on himself. It should be told that many of his creditors, when they heard the circumstances, declined to receive the money, or voluntarily presented it to him again. One of these was my neighbor ; he had been little accustomed to exemplary virtue, and the proffered money astonished him : he talked in loud commendaother meetings ought not to receive collections or bequests for the use of the poor, or any other services of the Society, of persons who have fallen short in the payment of their just debts, though legally discharged by their creditors : for until such persons have paid the deficiency, their possessions cannot in equity be considered as their own."

Official Documents of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends.

tion of what to him was unheard-of integrity ; signed a receipt for the amount, and sent it back as a present to the debtor. The other instance may furnish hints of a useful kind. It was the case of a female who had endeavored to support herself by the profits of a shop. She however became insolvent, paid some dividend, and received a discharge. She again entered into business, and in the course of years had accumulated enough to pay the remainder of her debts. But the infirmities of age were now coming on, and the annual income from her savings was just sufficient for the wants of declining years. Being thus at present unable to discharge her obligations without subjecting herself to the necessity of obtaining relief from others, she executed a will, directing that at her death the creditors should be paid the remainder of their demands : and when she died they were paid accordingly.

WILLS, LEGATEES, AND HEIRS.—The right of a person to order the distribution of his property after death, is recommended by its utility ; and were this less manifest than it is, it would be sufficient for us that the right is established by civil government.

It however happens in practice, that persons sometimes distribute their property in a manner that is both unreasonable and unjust. This evil the law cannot easily remedy ; and consequently the duty of remedying it, devolves upon those to whom the property is bequeathed. If they do not prevent the injustice, it cannot be prevented. This indicates the propriety, on the part of a legatee or an heir, of considering, when property devolves to him in a manner or in a proportion that appears improper, how he may exercise upright integrity, lest he should be the practical agent of injustice or oppression. Another cause for the exercise of this integrity consists in this circumstance :—When the right of a person to bequeath his property is admitted, it is evident that his intention ought in general to be the standard of his successor's conduct : and accordingly the law, in making enactments upon the subject, directs much of its solicitude to the means of ascertaining and of fulfilling the testator's intentions. These intentions must, according to the existing systems of jurisprudence, be ascertained by some general rules—by a written declaration perhaps, or a declaration of a specified kind, or made in a prescribed form, or attested in a particular manner. But in consequence of this it happens, that as through accident or inadvertency a testator does not always comply with these forms, the law, which adheres to its rules, frustrates his intentions, and therefore, in effect, defeats its own object in prescribing the forms. Here again the intentions of the deceased and the demands of equity cannot be fulfilled, except by the virtuous integrity of heirs and legatees.

I. If my father, who had one son besides myself, left nine-tenths of his property to me, and only the remaining tenth to my brother, I should not think the will, however authentic, justified me in taking so large a proportion, unless I could discover some reasonable motive which influenced my father's mind. If my brother already possessed a fortune and I had none ; if I were married and had a numerous family ; and he were single and unlikely to marry ; if he was incurably extravagant, and would probably in a few weeks or months squander his patrimony ; in these, or in such circumstances, I should think myself at liberty to appropriate my father's bequest : otherwise I should not. Thus, if the disproportionate division was the effect of some unreasonable prejudice against my brother, or fondness for me ; or if it was made at the unfair instigation of another person, or in a temporary fit of passion or disgust ; I could not, virtuously, enforce the will. The reason is plain. The will being unjust or extremely unreasonable, I should be guilty of injustice or extreme unreasonableness in enforcing it.

A man who possesses five thousand pounds, has two sons, of whom John is well provided for, and Thomas is not. With the privity of his sons he makes a will, leaving four thousand pounds to Thomas and one to John, explaining to both the reasons of this division. A fire happens in the house and the will is burnt; and the father, before he has the opportunity of making another, is carried off by a fever. Now the English law would assign a half of the money to each brother. If John demands his half, is he a just man? Every one I think will perceive that he is not, and that, if he demanded it, he would violate the duties of benevolence. The law is not his sufficient rule.

A person whose near relations do not stand in need of his money, adopts the children of distant relatives, with the declared intention or manifest design of providing for them at his death. If, under such circumstances, he dies without a will, the heir at law could not morally avail himself of his legal privilege, to the injury of these expectant parties. They need the money, and he does not; which is one good reason for not seizing it; but the intention of the deceased invested them with a right; and so that the intention is known, it matters little to the moral obligation, whether it is expressed on paper or not.

Possibly some reader may say, that if an heir or legatee must always institute enquiries into the uncertain claims of others before he accepts the property of the deceased, and if he is obliged to give up his own claims whenever their's seem to preponderate, he will be involved in endless doubts and scruples, and testators will never know whether their wills will be executed or not : the answer is, that no such scrupulousness is demanded. Hardheartedness, and extreme unreasonableness, and injustice, are one class of considerations ; critical scruples, and uncertain claims, are another.

It may be worth a paragraph to remark, that it is to be feared some persons think too complacently of their charitable bequests, or, what is worse, hope that it is a species of good works which will counterbalance the offence of some present irregularities of conduct. Such bequests ought not to be discouraged ; and yet it should be remembered, that he who gives money after his death, parts with nothing of his own. He gives it only when he cannot retain it. The man who leaves his money for the single purpose of doing good, does right : but he who hopes that it is a work of merit, should remember that the money is given, that the privation is endured, not by himself but by his heirs. A man who has more than he needs, should dispense it whilst it is his own.

MINORS' DEBTS.—A young man under twenty-one years of age purchases articles of a tradesman, of which some are necessary and some are not. Payment for unnecessary articles cannot be enforced by the English law—the reason with the Legislature being this, that thoughtless youths might be practised upon by designing persons, and induced to make needless and extravagant purchases. But is the youth who purchases unnecessary articles with the promise to pay when he becomes of age, exempted from the obligation? Now it is to be remembered, generally, that this obligation is not founded upon the law of the land, and therefore that the law cannot dispense with it. But if the tradesman has actually taken advantage of the inexperience of a youth, to cajole him into debts of which he was not conscious of the amount or the impropriety, it does not appear that he is obliged to pay them ; and for this reason, that he did not, in any proper sense of the term, come under an obligation to pay them. In other cases, the obligation remains. The circumstance that the law will not assist the creditor to recover the money does not dispense with it. It is fit, no doubt, that these dishonorable tradesmen should be punished, though the mode of punishing them is exceptionable indeed. It operates as a powerful temptation to fraud in young men, and it is a bad system to discourage dishonesty in one person by tempting the probity of another. The youth, too, is of all persons the last who should profit by the punishment of the trader. He is reprehensible himself; young men who contract such debts are seldom so young or so ignorant as not to know that they are doing wrong.

A man's wife "runs him into debt" by extravagant purchases which he is alike unable to prevent or to afford. Many persons sell goods to such a woman, who are conscious of her habits and of the husband's situation, yet continue to supply her extravagance, because they know the law will enable them to enforce payment from the husband. These persons act legally, but they are legally wicked. Do they act as they would desire others to act towards them? Would one of these men wish another tradesman so to supply his own wife if she was notoriously a spendthrift? If not, morality condemns his conduct: and the laws, in effect, condemn it too; for the Legislature would not have made husbands responsible for their wives' debts any more than for their children's, but for the presumption that the wife generally buys what the husband approves. Debts of unprincipled extravagance, are not debts which the law intended to provide that the husband should pay. If all women contracted such debts, the Legislature would instantly alter the law. If the Legislature could have made the distinction, perhaps it would have made it ; since it did not or could not, the deficiency must be supplied by private integrity.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.—The law of England provides, that if the possessor of a bill of exchange fails to demand payment on the day on which it becomes due, he takes the responsibility, in case of its eventual non-payment, from the previous endorsers, and incurs it himself. This as a general rule may be just. A party may be able to pay to-day and unable a week hence ; and if in such a case a loss arises by one man's negligence, it were manifestly unreasonable that it should be sustained by others. But if the acceptor becomes unable to pay a week or a month before the bill is due, the previous endorsers cannot in justice throw the loss upon the last possessor, even though he fails to present it on the appointed day. For why did the law make its provision? In order to secure persons from the loss of their property by the negligence of others over whom they had no control. But, in the supposed case, the loss is not occasioned by any such cause, and therefore the spirit of the law does not apply to it. You are insisting upon its literal, in opposition to its just, interpretation. Whether the bill was presented on the right day or the wrong, makes no difference to the previous endorsers, and for such a case the law was not made.

A similar rule of virtue applies to the case of giving notice of refusal to accept or to pay. If, in consequence of the want of this notice, the party is subjected to loss, he may avail himself of the legal exemption from the last possessor's claim. If the want of notice made no difference in his situation, he may not.

UNJUST DEFENDANTS.—It does not present a very favorable view of the state of private principle, that there are so many who refuse justice to plaintiffs, unless they are compelled to be just by the law. It is indisputable, that a multitude of suits are undertaken in order to obtain property or rights which the defendant knows he ought voluntarily to give up. Such a person is certainly a dishonest man. When the verdict is given against him, I regard him in the light of a convicted robber—differing from other robbers in the circumstance that he is tried at nisi prius instead of the Crown bar. For what is the difference between him who takes what is another's and him who withholds it? This severity of censure applies to some who are sued for damages. A man who, whether by design or inadvertency, has injured another, and will not compensate him unless he is legally compelled to do it, is surely unjust. Yet many of these persons seem to think that injury to property, or person, or character, entails no duty to make reparation except it be enforced. Why, the law does not create this duty, it only compels us to fulfil it. If the minds of such persons were under the influence of integrity, they would pay such debts without compulsion.—This subject is one amongst the many upon which public opinion needs to be aroused and to be rectified. When our estimates of moral character are adjusted to individual probity of principle, some of those who now pass in society as creditable persons, will be placed at the same point on the scale of morality, as many of those who are consigned to a jail.

An upright man should not accept a present of a hundred pounds from a person who had not paid his debts, nor become his legatee. If the money were not rightfully his, he cannot give it ; if it be rightfully his creditors' it cannot be mine.

PRIVATEERS.—Although familiarity with war occasions many obliquities in the moral notions of a people, yet the silent verdict of public opinion is, I think, against the rectitude of privateering. It is not regarded as creditable and virtuous ; and this public disapprobation appears to be on the increase. Considerable exertion at least has been made, on the part of the American government, to abolish it.—To this private plunderer himself I do not talk of the obligations of morality ; he has many lessons of virtue to learn before he will be likely to listen to such virtue as it is the object of these pages to recommend : but to him who perceives the flagitiousness of the practice, I would urge the consideration that he ought not to receive the plunder of a privateer even at second hand. If a man ought not to be the legatee of a bankrupt, he ought not to be the legatee of him who gained his money by privateering. Yet it is to be feared that many who would not fit out a privateer, would accept the money which the owners had stolen. If it be stolen, it is not theirs to give ; and what one has no right to give, another has no right to accept.

During one of our wars with France, a gentleman who entertained such views of integrity as these was partner in a merchant vessel, and, in spite of his representations, the other owners resolved to fit her out as a privateer. They did so, and she happened to capture several vessels. This gentleman received from time to time his share of the prizes, and laid it by ; till, at the conclusion of the war, it amounted to a considerable sum. What was to be done with the money ? He felt that, as an upright man, he could not retain the money ; and he accordingly went to France, advertised for the owners of the captured vessels, and returned to them the amount. Such conduct, instead of being a matter for good men to admire, and for men of loose morality to regard as needless scrupulosity, ought, when such circumstances arise, to be an ordinary occurrence. I do not relate the fact because I think it entitles the party to any extraordinary praise. He was honest ; and honesty was his duty. The praise, if praise be due, consists in this—that he was upright where most men would have been unjust. Similar integrity upon parallel subjects may often be exhibited again—upon privateering it cannot often be repeated; for when the virtue of the public is great enough to make such integrity frequent, it will be great enough to frown privateering from the world.

At the time of war with the Dutch, about forty years ago, an English merchant vessel captured a Dutch Indiaman. It happened that one of the owners of the merchantman was one of the Society of Friends or Quakers. This society, as it objects to war, does not permit its members to share in such a manner in the profits of war. However, this person, when he heard of the capture, insured his share of the prize. The vessel could not be brought into port, and he received of the underwriters eighteen hundred pounds. To have retained this money would have been equivalent to quitting the society, so he gave it to his friends to dispose of it as justice might appear to prescribe. The state of public affairs on the Continent did not allow the trustees immediately to take any active measures to discover the owners of the captured vessel. The money, therefore, was allowed to accumulate. At the termination of the war with France, the circumstances of the case were repeatedly published in the Dutch journals, and the full amount of every claim that has been clearly made out has been paid by the trustees.

CONFISCATIONS.—I do not know whether the history of confiscations affords any examples of persons who refused to accept the confiscated property. Yet, when it is considered under what circumstances these seizures are frequently made—of revolution and civil war, and the like, when the vindictive passions overpower the claims of justice and humanity—it cannot be doubted that the acceptance of confiscated property has sometimes been an act irreconcilable with integrity. Look, for example, at the confiscations of the French Revolution. The Government which at the moment held the reins, doubtless sanctioned the appropriation of the property which they seized; and in so far the acceptance was legal. But that surely is not sufficient. Let an upright man suppose himself to be the neighbor of another, who, with his family, enjoys the comforts of a paternal estate. In the distractions of political turbulence this neighbor is carried off and banished, and the estate is seized by order of the government. Would such a man accept this estate when the government offered it, without enquiry and consideration? Would he sit down in the warm comforts of plenty, whilst his neighbor was wandering, destitute perhaps, in another land, and whilst his family were in sorrow and in want? Would he not consider whether the confiscation was consistent with justice and rectitude—and whether, if it were right with respect to the man, it was right with respect to his children and his wife, who perhaps did not participate in his offences? It may serve to give clearness to our perception to consider, that if Louis XVII. had been restored to the throne soon after his father's death, it is probable that many of the emigrants would have been reinstated in their possessions. Louis's restoration might have been the result of some intrigue, or of a battle. Do, then, the obligations of mankind as to enjoying the property of another, depend on such circumstances as battles and intrigues? If the returning emigrant would have rightfully repossessed his estate if the battle was successful, can the present occupier rightfully possess it if the battle is not successful? Is the result of a political manœuvre a proper rule to guide a man's conscience in retaining or giving up the houses and lands of his neighbors? Politicians, and those who profit by confiscations, may be little influenced by considerations like these; but there are other men, who, I think, will perceive that they are important, and who, though confiscated property may never be offered to them, will be able to apply the principles which these considerations illustrate, to their own conduct in other affairs.

INSURANCE.—It is very possible for a man to act dishonestly every day and yet never to defraud another of a shilling. A merchant who conducts his business partly or wholly with borrowed capital, is not honest if he endangers the loss of an amount of property which, if lost, would disable him from paying his debts. He who possesses a thousand pounds of his own and borrows a thousand of some one else, cannot virtuously speculate so extensively as that, if his prospects should be disappointed, he would lose twelve hundred. The speculation is dishonest whether it succeeds or not: it is risking other men's property without their consent. Under similar circumstances it is unjust not to insure. Perhaps the majority of uninsured traders, if their houses and goods were burnt, would be unable to pay their creditors. The injustice consists not in the actual loss which may be inflicted, (for whether a fire happens or not, the injustice is the same,) but in endangering the infliction of the loss. There are but two ways in which, under such circumstances, the claims of rectitude can be satisfied—one is by not endangering the property, and the other by telling its actual owner that it will be endangered, and leaving him to incur the risk or not as he pleases.

“Those who hold the property of others are not warranted, on the principles of justice, in neglecting to inform themselves from time to time, of the real situation of their affairs.”* This enforces the doctrines which we have delivered. It asserts that injustice attaches to not investigating; and this injustice is often real whether creditors are injured or not.

* Official Documents of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends; 1826.

During the seventeenth century, when religious persecution was very active, some beautiful examples of integrity were offered by its victims. It was common for officers to seize the property of conscientious and good men, and sometimes to plunder them with such relentless barbarity as scarcely to leave them the common utensils of a kitchen. These persons sometimes had the property of others on their premises, and when they heard that the officers were likely to make a seizure, industriously removed from their premises all property but their own. At one period, a number of traders in the country who had made purchases in the London markets, found that their plunderers were likely to disable them from paying for their purchases, and they requested the merchants to take back, and the merchants did take back, their goods.

In passing, I would remark, that the readers of mere general history only, are very imperfectly acquainted with the extent to which persecution on account of religion has been practised in these kingdoms, ages since protestantism became the religion of the state. A competent acquaintance with this species of history, is of incomparable greater value than much of the matter with which historians are wont to fill their pages.

SETTLEMENTS.—It is not an unfrequent occurrence, when a merchant or other person becomes insolvent, that the creditors unexpectedly find the estate is chargeable with a large settlement on the wife. There is a consideration connected with this which in a greater degree involves integrity of character than perhaps is often supposed. Men in business obtain credit from others in consequence of the opinions which others form of their character and property. The latter,

if it be not the greater foundation of credit, is a great one. A person lives then at the rate of a thousand a year; he maintains a respectable establishment, and diffuses over all its parts indications of property. These appearances are relied upon by other men: they think they may safely entrust him, and they do entrust him, with goods or money; until, when his insolvency is suddenly announced, they are surprised and alarmed, to find that five hundred a year is settled on his wife. Now this person has induced others to confide their property to him by holding out fallacious appearances. He has in reality deceived them; and the deception is as real, though it may not be as palpable, as if he had deluded them with verbal falsehoods. He has been acting a continued untruth. Perhaps such a man will say that he never denied that the greater part of his apparent property was settled on his wife. This may be true; but, when his neighbor came to him to lodge five or six hundred pounds in his hands; when he was conscious that this neighbor's confidence was founded upon the belief that his apparent property was really his own; when there was reason to apprehend, that if his neighbor had known his actual circumstances he would have hesitated in entrusting him with the money, then he does really and practically deceive his neighbor, and it is not a sufficient justification to say that he has uttered no untruth. The reader will observe that the case is very different from that of a person who conducts his business with borrowed money. This person must annually pay the income of the money to the lender. He does not expend it on his own establishment, and consequently does not hold out the same fallacious appearances. Some profligate spendthrifts take a house, buy elegant furniture, and keep a handsome equipage, in order by these appearances to deceive and defraud traders. No man doubts whether these persons act criminally. How then can he be innocent who knowingly practises a deception similar in kind though varying in degree?

HOUSES OF INFAMY.—If it were not that a want of virtue is so common amongst men, we should wonder at the coolness with which some persons of decent reputation are content to let their houses to persons of abandoned character, and to put periodically into their pockets, the profits of infamy. Sophisms may easily be invented to palliate the conduct; but nothing can make it right. Such a landlord knows perfectly to what purposes his house will be devoted, and knows that he shall receive the wages, not perhaps of his own iniquity, but still the wages of iniquity. He is almost a partaker with them in their sins. If I were to sell a man arsenic or a pistol, knowing that the buyer wanted it to commit murder, should I not be a bad man? If I let a man a house, knowing that the renter wants it for purposes of wickedness, am I an innocent man? Not that it is to be affirmed that no one may receive ill-gotten money. A grocer may sell a pound of sugar to a woman though he knows she is upon the town. But, if we cannot specify the point at which a lawful degree of participation terminates, we can determine respecting some degrees of participation, that they are unlawful. To the majority of such offenders against the moral law, these arguments may be urged in vain; there are some of whom we may indulge greater hope. Respectable public brewers are in the habit of purchasing beer houses in order that they may supply the publicans with their porter. Some of these houses are notoriously the resort of the most abandoned of mankind; the daily scenes of riot, and drunkenness, and of the most filthy debauchery. Yet these houses are purchased by brewers—perhaps there is a competition amongst them for the premises; they put in a tenant of their own, supply him with beer, and regularly receive the profits of this excess of wickedness. Is there no such obligation as that of abstaining even from the appearance of evil? Is there no such thing as guilt without a personal participation in it? All pleas such as that, if one man did not supply such a house another would, are vain subterfuges. Upon such reasoning, you might rob a traveller on the road, if you knew that at the next turning a footpad was waiting to plunder him if you did not. Selling such houses to be occupied as before, would be like selling slaves because you thought it criminal to keep them in bondage. The obligation to discountenance wickedness rests upon him who possesses the power. "To him who knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." To retain our virtue may in such cases cost us something, but he who values virtue at its worth will not think that he retains it at a dear rate.

LITERARY PROPERTY.—Upon similar grounds there are some of the profits of the press which a good man cannot accept. There are some periodical works and some newspapers, from which, if he were offered an annual income, he would feel himself bound to reject it. Suppose there is a newspaper which is lucrative because it gratifies a vicious taste for slander or indecency—or suppose there is a magazine of which the profits result from the attraction of irreligious or licentious articles, I would not put into my pocket, every quarter of a year, the money which was gained by vitiating mankind. In all such cases, there is one sort of obligation which applies with great force, the obligation not to discourage rectitude by our example. Upon this ground, a man of virtue would hesitate even to contribute an article to such a publication, lest they who knew he was a contributor, should think they had his example to justify improprieties of their own.

REWARDS.—A person loses his pocket-book containing fifty pounds, and offers ten pounds to the finder if he will restore it. The finder ought not to demand the reward. It implies surely some imputation upon a man's integrity, when he accepts payment for being honest. For, for what else is he paid? If he retains the property he is manifestly fraudulent. To be paid for giving it up, is to be paid for not committing fraud. The loser offers the reward in order to over-power the temptation to dishonesty. To accept the reward is therefore tacitly to acknowledge that you would have been dishonest if it had not been offered. This certainly is not maintaining an integrity that is "above suspicion." It will be said that the reward is offered voluntarily. This, in proper language, is not true. Two evils are presented to the loser, of which he is compelled to choose one. If men were honest, he would not offer the reward: he would make it known that he had lost his pocket-book, and the finder, if a finder there were, would restore it. The offered ten pounds is a tax which is imposed upon him by the want of uprightness in mankind, and he who demands the money actively promotes the imposition. The very word reward carries with it its own reprobation. As a reward, the man of integrity would receive nothing. If the loser requested it, he might if he needed it, accept a donation; but he would let it be understood, that he accepted a present not that he received a debt.

Perhaps examples enough or more than enough, have been accumulated to illustrate this class of obligations. Many appeared needful, because it is a class which is deplorably neglected in practice. So strong is the temptation to think that we may rightfully possess whatever the law assigns to us—so insinuating is the notion, upon subjects of property, that whatever the law does not punish we may rightfully do, that there is little danger of supplying too many motives to habitual discrimination of our duties and to habitual purity of conduct. Let the reader especially remember, that the examples which are offered are not all of them selected on account of their individual importance, but rather as illustrations of the general principle. A man may meet with a hundred circumstances in life to which none of these examples are relevant, but I think he will not have much difficulty in estimating the principles which they illustrate. And this induces the observation, that although several of these examples are taken from British law or British customs, they do not, on that account, lose their applicability where these laws and customs do not obtain. If this book should ever be read in a foreign land, or if it should be read in this land when public institutions or the tenor of men's conduct shall be changed, the principles of its morality will, nevertheless, be applicable to the affairs of life.

---

CHAPTER III.

INEQUALITY OF PROPERTY.

Accumulation of wealth : its proper limits—Provision for children : “ Keeping up the family.”

THAT many and great evils result from that inequality of property which exists in civilized countries, is indicated by the many propositions which have been made to diminish or destroy it. We want not indeed such evidence ; for it is sufficiently manifest to every man who will look round upon his neighbors. We join not with those who declaim against all inequality of property : the real evil is not that it is unequal, but that it is greatly unequal ; not that one man is richer than another, but that one man is so rich as to be luxurious, or imperious, or profligate, and that another is so poor as to be abject and depraved, as well as to be destitute of the proper comforts of life.

There are two means by which this pernicious inequality of property may be diminished ; by political institutions, and by the exertions of private men. Our present business is with the latter.

To a person who possesses and expends more than he needs, there are two reasonable inducements to diminish its amount—first, to benefit others, and next to benefit his family and himself. The claims of benevolence towards others are often and earnestly urged upon the public, and for that reason they will not be repeated here. Not that there is no occasion to repeat the lesson, for it is very inadequately learnt ; but that it is of more consequence to exhibit obligations which are less frequently enforced. To insist upon diminishing the amount of a man's property for the sake of his family and himself, may present to some men new ideas, and to some men the doctrine may be paradoxical.

Large possessions are in a great majority of instances injurious to the possessor—that is to say, those who hold them are generally less excellent, both as citizens and as men, than those who do not. The truth appears to be established by the concurrent judgment of mankind. Lord Bacon says—“Certainly great riches have sold more men than they have bought out. As baggage is to an army, so are riches to virtue.—It hindereth the march, yea and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory.”—“It is to be feared that the general tendency of rank, and especially of riches, is to withdraw the heart from spiritual exercises.”* “A much looser system of morals commonly prevails in the higher than in the middling and lower orders of society.”† “The middle rank contains most virtue and abilities.”‡ “Wealth heap’d on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,

The dangers gather as the treasures rise.”‡

It was an observation of Voltaire’s that the English people were, like their butts of beer, froth at top, dregs at bottom—in the middle excellent. The most rational, the wisest, the best portion of mankind, belong to that class who “possess neither poverty nor riches.” Let the reader look around him. Let him observe who are the persons that contribute most to the moral and physical amelioration of mankind; who they are that practically and personally support our unnumbered institutions of benevolence; who they are that exhibit the worthiest examples of intellectual exertion; who they are to whom he would himself apply if he needed to avail himself of a manly and discriminating judgment. That they are the poor is not to be expected: we appeal to himself whether they are the rich. Who then would make his son a rich man? Who would remove his child out of that station in society which is thus peculiarly favorable to intellectual and moral excellence?

If a man knows that wealth will in all probability be injurious to himself and to his children, injurious too in the most important points, the religious and moral character, it is manifestly a point of the soundest wisdom and the truest kindness to decline to accumulate it. Upon this subject, it is admirable to observe with what exactness the precepts of Christianity are adapted

* More’s Moral Sketches, 3d Edit. p. 446.

† Wilberforce : Pract. View.

‡ Wollestoncroft : Rights of Women, c. 4.

§ Johnson : Vanity of Human Wishes.

to that conduct which the experience of life recommends. "The care of this world and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word:"—"choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection;"—"How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition." Not that riches necessarily lead to these consequences, but that such is their tendency; a tendency so uniform and powerful that it is to be feared these are their very frequent results. Now this language of the Christian scriptures does not contain merely statements of fact—it imposes duties; and whatever may be the precise mode of regarding those duties, one point is perfectly clear;—that he who sets no other limit to his possessions or accumulations than inability or indisposition to obtain more, does not conform to the will of God. Assuredly, if any specified thing is declared by Christianity to be highly likely to obstruct our advancement in goodness, and to endanger our final felicity, against that thing, whatever it be, it is imperative upon us to guard with wakeful solicitude.

And therefore, without affirming that no circumstance can justify a great accumulation of property, it may safely be concluded that far the greater number of those who do accumulate it, do wrong: nor do I see any reason to be deterred from ranking the distribution of a portion of great wealth, or refusal to accumulate it, amongst the imperative duties which are imposed by the moral law. In truth, a man may almost discover whether such conduct is obligatory, by referring to the motives which induce him to acquire great property or to retain it. The motives are generally impure; the desire of splendor, or the ambition of eminence, or the love of personal indulgence. Are these motives fit to be brought into competition with the probable welfare, the virtue, the usefulness, and the happiness of his family and himself? Yet such is the competition, and to such unworthy objects, duty, and reason, and affection are sacrificed.

It will be said, a man should provide for his family; and make them, if he can, independent. That he should provide for his family is true; that he should make them independent, at any rate that he should give them an affluent independence, forms no part of his duty, and is frequently a violation of it. As it respects almost all men, he will best approve himself a wise and kind parent, who leaves to his sons so much only as may enable them, by moderate engagements, to enjoy the conveniences and comforts of life; and to his daughters a sufficiency to possess similar comforts, but not a sufficiency to shine amongst the great, or to mingle with the votaries of expensive dissipation. If any father prefers other objects to the welfare and happiness of his children—if wisdom and kindness towards them are with him subordinate considerations, it is not probable that he will listen to reasonings like these. But where is the parent who dares to acknowledge this preference to his own mind?

It were idle to affect to specify any amount of property which a person ought not to exceed. The circumstances of one man may make it reasonable that he should acquire or retain much more than another who has fewer claims. Yet somewhat of a general rule may be suggested. He who is accumulating should consider why he desires more. If it really is, that he believes an addition will increase the welfare and usefulness and virtue of his family, it is probable that further accumulation may be right. If no such belief is sincerely entertained, it is more than probable that it is wrong. He who already possesses affluence should consider its actual existing effects.—If he employs a competent portion of it in increasing the happiness of others, if it does not produce any injurious effect upon his own mind, if it does not diminish or impair the virtues of his children, if they are grateful for their privileges rather than vain of their superiority, if they second his own endeavors to diffuse happiness around them, he may remain as he is. If such effects are not produced, but instead of them others of an opposite tendency, he certainly has too much.—Upon this serious subject let the Christian parent be serious. If, as is proved by the experience of every day, great property usually inflicts great injuries upon those who possess it, what motive can induce a good man to lay it up for his children? What motive will be his justification, if it tempts them from virtue?

When children are similarly situated with respect to their probable wants, there seems no reason for preferring the elder to the younger, or sons to daughters. Since the proper object of a parent in making a division of his property, is the comfort and welfare of his children—if this object is likely to be better secured by an equal than by any other division, an equal division ought to be made. It is a common, though not a very reasonable opinion, that a son needs a larger portion than a daughter. To be sure, if he is to live in greater affluence than she, he does. But why should he? There appears no motive in reason, and certainly there is none in affection, for diminishing one child's comforts to increase another's. A son too has greater opportunities of gain. A woman almost never grows rich except by legacies or marriage; so that, if her father do not provide for her, it is probable that she will not be provided for at all. As to marriage, the opportunity is frequently not offered to a woman; and a father if he can, should so provide for his daughter as to enable her, in single life, to live in a state of comfort not greatly inferior to her brother's. The remark that the custom of preferring sons is general, and therefore that when a couple marry the inequality is adjusted, applies only to the case of those who do marry. The number of women who do not is great; and a parent cannot foresee his daughter's lot. Besides, since marriage is (and is reasonably) a great object to a woman, and is desirable both for women and for men, there appears a propriety in increasing the probability of marriage by giving to women such property as shall constitute an additional inducement to marriage in the men. I shall hardly be suspected of recommending persons to "marry for money." My meaning is this: A young man possesses five hundred a year, and lives on a corresponding scale. He is attached to a woman who has but one hundred a year. This young man sees that if he marries, he must reduce his scale of living; and the consideration operates (I do not say that it ought to operate) to deter him from marriage. But if the young man possessed three hundred a year and lived accordingly, and if the object of his attachment possessed three hundred a year also, he would not be prevented from marrying her by the fear of being obliged to diminish his system of expenditure. Just complaints are made of those half-concealed blandishments by which some women who need "a settlement" endeavor to procure it by marriage. Those blandishments would become more tempered with propriety, if one great motive was taken away by the possession of a competence of their own.

Perhaps it is remarkable, that the obligation not to accumulate great property for ourselves or our children, is so little enforced by the writers on morality.

None will dispute that such accumulation is both unwise and unkind. Every one acknowledges too that the general evils of the existing inequality of property are enormously great; yet how few insist upon those means by which, more than by any other private means, these evils may be diminished! If all men declined to retain, or refrained from acquiring, more than is likely to be beneficial to their families and themselves, the pernicious inequality of property would quickly be diminished or destroyed. There is a motive upon the individual to do this, which some public reformations do not offer. He who contributes almost nothing to diminish the general mischiefs of extreme poverty and extreme wealth, may yet do so much benefit to his own connections as shall greatly overpay him for the sacrifice of vanity or inclination. Perhaps it may be said that there is a claim too of justice. A man who has acquired a reasonable sufficiency, and who nevertheless retains his business to acquire more than a sufficiency, practises a sort of injustice towards another who needs his means of gain. There are always many who cannot enjoy the comforts of life, because others are improperly occupying the means by which those comforts are to be obtained. Is it the part of a Christian to do this?—even abating the consideration that he is injuring himself by withholding comforts from another.

---

CHAPTER IV.

LITIGATION—ARBITRATION.

Practice of early Christians—Evils of Litigation—Efficiency of Arbitration.

IN the third Essay,* some enquiry will be attempted, as to whether justice may not often be administered between contending parties, or to public offenders, by some species of arbitration rather than by law;—whether a gradual substitution of equity for fixed rules of decision, is not congruous alike with philosophy and morals.—The present chapter, however, and that which succeeds it, proceed upon the supposition that the administration of justice continues in its present state.

The question for an individual, when he has some cause of dispute with another respecting property or rights is, By what means ought I to endeavor to adjust it? Three modes of adjustment may be supposed to be offered: Private arrangement with the other party—Reference to impartial men—and law. Private adjustment is the best mode; arbitration is good; law is good only when it is the sole alternative.

The litigiousness of some of the early Christians at Corinth gave occasion to the energetic exhortation; “Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? How much more things that pertain to this life? If then, ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church. I speak to your shame. Is it so that there is not a wise man among you? No, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?"* Upon this, one observation is especially to be remembered: that a great part of its pointedness of reprehension is directed, not so much to litigation, as to litigation before pagans. "Brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers." The impropriety of exposing the disagreements of Christians in pagan courts, was manifest and great. They who had rejected the dominant religion, for a religion of which one peculiar characteristic was good will and unanimity, were especially called upon to exhibit in their conduct an illustration of its purer principles. Few things, not grossly vicious, would bring upon Christians and upon Christianity itself so much reproach as a litigiousness which could not or would not find arbitration amongst themselves. The advice of the apostle appears to have been acted upon: "The primitive church, which was always zealous to reconcile the brethren and to procure pardon for the offender from the person offended, did ordain, according to the epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, that the saints or Christians should not maintain a process of law one against the other at the bar of tribunals of infidels."† The Christian of the present day is differently circumstanced, because, though he appeals to the law, he does not appeal to pagan judges; and therefore so much of the apostle's censure as was occasioned by the paganism of the courts, does not apply to us.

* Chap. X.

* I Cor. vi.

† Ryeaut's Lives of the Popes, fol. 2d, ed. 1688, Intro. p. 2.

To this indeed there is an exception founded upon analogy. If at the commencement of the Reformation, two of the reformers had carried a dispute respecting property before Romish courts, they would have come under some portion of that reprobation which was addressed to the Corinthians. Certainly, when persons profess such a love for religious purity and excellence that they publicly withdraw from the general religion of a people, there ought to be so much purity and excellence amongst them, that it would be needless to have recourse to those from whom they had separated, to adjust their disputes. The Catholic of those days might reasonably have turned upon such reformers and said, "Is it so that there is not a wise man among you, no not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?" And if indeed, no such wise man was to be found, it might safely be concluded that their reformation was an empty name.—For the same reasons, those who, in the present times, think it right to withdraw from other protestant churches in order to maintain sounder doctrines or purer practice, cast reproach upon their own community if they cannot settle their disputes amongst themselves. Pretensions to soundness and purity are of little avail if they do not enable those who make them to repose in one another such confidence as this. Were I a Wesleyan or a Baptist, I should think it discreditable to go to law with one of my own brotherhood.

But, though the apostle's prohibition of going to law appears to have been founded upon the paganism of the courts, his language evidently conveys disapprobation, generally, of appeals to the law. He insists upon the propriety of adjusting disputes by arbitration. Christians, he says, ought not to be unworthy to judge the smallest matters ; and so emphatically does he insist upon the truth, that their religion ought to capacitate them to act as arbitrators, that he intimates that even a small advance in Christian excellence is sufficient for such a purpose as this :—“ Set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church.” It will perhaps be acknowledged that when Christianity shall possess its proper influence over us, there will be little reason to recur, for adjustment of our disagreements, to fixed rules of law. And though this influence is so far short of universal prevalence, who cannot find amongst those to whom he may have access, some who are capable of deciding rightly and justly ? The state of that Christian country must indeed be bad, if it contains not, even in every little district, one that is able to judge between his brethren.

Nevertheless, there are cases in which the Christian may properly appeal to the law. He may have an antagonist who can in no other manner be induced to be just, or to act aright. Under some such circumstances Paul himself pursued a similar course : “ I appeal unto Cæsar.”—“ Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned ?” And when he had been illegally taken into custody he availed himself of his legal privileges, and made the magistrates “ come themselves and fetch him out.” There are, besides, in the present condition of jurisprudence, some cases in which the rule of justice depends upon the rule of law—so that a thing is just or not just according as the law determines. In such cases, neither party, however well disposed, may be able distinctly to tell what justice requires until the law informs them. Even then, however, there are better means of procedure than by prosecuting suits. The parties may obtain “ Opinions.”

Besides these considerations there are others which powerfully recommend arbitration in preference to law.

The evils of litigation, from which arbitration is in a great degree exempt, are great.

Expense is an important item. A reasonable man desires of course to obtain justice as inexpensively as he can ; and the great cost of obtaining it in courts of law, is a powerful reason for preferring arbitration.

Legal Injustice.—He who desires that justice should be dispensed between him and another, should sufficiently bear in mind how much injustice is inflicted by the law. We have seen in some of the preceding chapters that law is often very wide of equity ; and he who desires to secure himself from an inequitable decision, possesses a powerful motive to prefer arbitration. The technicalities of the law and the artifices of lawyers are almost innumerable. Sometimes, when a party thinks he is on the eve of obtaining a just verdict, he is suddenly disappointed and his cause is lost by some technical defect—the omission of a word or the mis-spelling of a name ; matters which in no degree affect the validity of his claims. If the only advantage which arbitration offers to disagreeing parties, was exemption from these deplorable evils, it would be a substantial and sufficient argument in its favor. There is no reason to doubt, that justice would generally be administered by a reference to two or three upright and disinterested men. When facts are laid before such persons, they are seldom at a loss to decide what justice requires. Its principles are not so critical or remote as usually to require much labor of research to discover what they dictate. It might be concluded, therefore, even if experience did not confirm it, that an arbitration, if it did not decide absolutely aright, would at least come to as just a decision as can be attained by human means. But experience does confirm the conclusion. It is known that the Society of Friends never permits its members to carry disagreements with one another before courts of law. All, if they continue in the Society must submit to arbitration. And what is the consequence? They find, practically, that arbitration is the best mode: that justice is in fact administered by it, administered more satisfactorily and with fewer exceptions than in legal courts. No one pretends to dispute this. Indeed if it were disputable, it may be presumed that this community would abandon the practice. They adhere to it because it is the most Christian practice and the best.

Inquietude.—The expense, the injustice, the delays and vexations which are attendant upon lawsuits, bring altogether a degree of inquietude upon the mind which greatly deducts from the enjoyment of life, and from the capacity to attend with composure to other and perhaps more important concerns. If to this we add the heart-burnings and ill-will which suits frequently occasion, a considerable sum of evil is in this respect presented to us: a sum of evil, be it remembered, from which arbitration is in a great degree exempt.

Upon the whole, arbitration is recommended by such various and powerful arguments, that when it is proposed by one of two contending parties and objected to by the other, there is reason to presume that, with that other, justice is not the paramount object of desire.

---

CHAPTER V.

••

THE MORALITY OF LEGAL PRACTICE.

Complexity of law—Professional untruths—Defences of legal practice—Effects of legal practice : Seduction : Theft : Peculation—Pleading—The duties of the profession—Effects of legal practice on the profession, and on the public.

IF it should be asked why, in a book of general morality, the writer selects for observation the practice of a particular profession, the answer is simply this, that the practice of this particular profession peculiarly needs it. It peculiarly needs to be brought into juxtaposition with sound principles of morality. Besides this, an honest comparison of the practice with the principles will afford useful illustration of the requisitions of virtue.

That public opinion pronounces that there is, in the ordinary character of legal practice, much that is not reconcilable with rectitude, can need no proof. The public opinion could scarcely become general unless it were founded upon truth, and that it is general is evinced by the language of all ranks of men ; from that of him who writes a treatise of morality, to that of him who familiarly uses a censorious proverb. It may reasonably be concluded that when the professional conduct of a particular set of men is characterized peculiarly with sacrifices of rectitude, there must be some general and peculiar cause. There appears nothing in the profession, as such, to produce this effect — nothing in taking a part in the administration of justice which necessarily leads men away from the regard to justice. How then are we to account for the fact as it exists, or where shall we primarily lay the censure? Is it the fault of the men, or of the institutions ; of the lawyers or of the law? Doubtless the original fault is in the law.

Wherever fixed rules of deciding controversies between man and man, or fixed rules of administering punishment to public offenders are established—there it is inevitable that equity will sometimes be sacrificed to rules. These rules are laws, that is, they must be uniformly, and for the most part literally applied; and this literal application (as we have already had manifold occasion to show,) is sometimes productive of practical injustice. Since, then, the legal profession employ themselves in enforcing this literal application—since they habitually exert themselves to do this with little regard to the equity of the result, they cannot fail to deserve and to obtain the character of a profession that sacrifices rectitude. I know not that this is evitable so long as numerous and fixed rules are adopted in the administration of justice.

But whilst thus the original cause of the sacrifice of virtue amongst legal men is to be sought in legal institutions, it cannot be doubted that they are themselves chargeable with greatly adding to the evils which these institutions occasion. This is just what, in the present state of human virtue, we might expect. Lawyers familiarize to their minds the notion, that whatever is legally right is right; and when they have once habituated themselves to sacrifice the manifest dictates of equity to law, where shall they stop? If a material informality in an instrument is to them sufficient justification of a sacrifice of these dictates, they will soon sacrifice them because a word has been mis-spelt by an attorney's clerk. When they have gone thus far, they will go further. The practice of disregarding rectitude in courts of justice will become habitual. They will go onward, from insisting upon legal technicalities to an endeavor to pervert the law, then to the giving a false coloring to facts, and then onward and still onward until witnesses are abashed and confounded, until juries are misled by impassioned appeals to their feelings, until deliberate untruths are solemnly averred, until, in a word, all the pitiable and degrading spectacles are exhibited which are now exhibited in legal practice.

But when we say that the original cause of this unhappy system is to be found in the law itself, is it tantamount to a justification of the system? No: if it were, it would be sufficient to justify any departure from rectitude—it would be sufficient to justify any crime, to be able to show that the perpetrator possessed strong temptation. Strong temptation is undoubtedly placed before the legal practitioner. This should abate our censure, but it should not cause us to be silent.

We affirm that a lawyer cannot morally enforce the application of legal rules, without regard to the claims of equity in the particular case.

If it has been seen, in the preceding chapters, that morality is paramount to law; if it has been seen that there are many instances in which private persons are morally obliged to forego their legal pretensions, then it is equally clear that a lawyer is obliged to hold morality as paramount to law in his own practice. If one man may not urge an unjust legal pretension, another may not assist him in urging it. No man it may be hoped will say it is the lawyer's only business to apply the law. Men cannot so cheaply exempt themselves from the obligations of morality. Yet here the question is really suspended; for if the business of the profession does not justify a disregard of morality, it is not capable of justification. Suspended! It is lamentable that such a question can exist. For to what does the alternative lead us? Is a man, when he undertakes a client's business, at liberty to advance his interest by every method, good or bad, which the law will not punish? If he is, there is an end of morality.

If he is not, something must limit and restrict him ; and that something is the moral law.

Of every custom, however indefensible, some advocates offer themselves ; and some accordingly have attempted to justify the practice of the bar.* Of that particular item in the practice, which consists in uttering untruths in order to serve a client, Dr. Paley has been the defender. “There are falsehoods,” says he, “which are not criminal ; as where no one is deceived, which is the case with an advocate in asserting the justice, or his belief of the justice, of his client’s cause.” It is plain that in support of this position one argument, and only one can be urged, and that one has been selected. “No confidence is destroyed, because none was reposed ; no promise to speak the truth is violated, because none was given or understood to be given.”† The defence is not very creditable even if it were valid : it defends men from the imputation of falsehood because their falsehoods are so habitual that no one gives them credit !

But the defence is not valid. Of this the reader may satisfy himself by considering why, if no one ever believes what advocates say, they continue to speak. They would not, year after year, persist in uttering untruths in our courts, without attaining an object, and knowing that they would not attain it. If no one ever in fact believed them, they would cease to asseverate. They do not love falsehood for its own sake, and utter it gratuitously and for nothing. The custom itself, therefore, disproves the argument that is brought to defend it. Whenever that defence becomes valid—whenever it is really true that “no confidence is re-

* I speak of the bar, because that branch of the profession offers the most convenient illustration of the subject. The reasonings will generally apply to other branches.

† Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 3. p. l. c. 15.

posed" in advocates, they will cease to use falsehood, for it will have lost its motive. But the real practice is to mingle falsehood and truth together, and so to involve the one with the other that the jury cannot easily separate them. The jury know that some of the pleader's statements are true, and these they believe. Now he makes other statements with the same deliberate emphasis; and how shall the jury know whether these are false or true? How shall they discover the point at which they shall begin to "repose no confidence?" Knowing that a part is true, they cannot always know that another part is not true. That it is the pleader's design to persuade them of the truth of all he affirms, is manifest. Suppose an advocate when he rose should say, "Gentlemen, I am now going to speak the truth;" and after narrating the facts of the case should say, "Gentlemen, I am now going to address you with fictions." Why would not an advocate do this? Because then no confidence would be reposed, which is the same thing as to say that he pursues his present plan because some confidence is reposed; and this decides the question. The decision should not be concealed—that the advocate who employs untruths in his pleadings, does really and most strictly, lie.

And even if no one ever did believe an advocate, his false declarations would still be lies, because he always professes to speak the truth. This indeed is true upon the Archdeacon's own showing; for he says, "Whoever seriously addresses his discourse to another, tacitly promises to speak the truth." The case is very different from others which he proposes as parallel—"parables, fables, jests." In these, the speaker does not profess to state facts. But the pleader does profess to state facts. He intends and endeavors to mislead. His untruths therefore are lies to him whether they are believed or not; just as, in vulgar life, a man whose falsehoods are so notorious that no one gives him credit, is not the less a liar than if he were believed.

Gisborne is another defender of legal practice, and assumes a wider ground of justification. "The standard," says he, "to which the advocate refers the cause of his client, is not the law of reason nor the law of God, but the law of the land. His peculiar and proper object is not to prove the side of the question which he maintains morally right, but legally right. The law offers its protection only on certain preliminary conditions; it refuses to take cognizance of injuries or to enforce redress, unless the one be proved in the specific manner and the other claimed in the precise form, which it prescribes; and consequently, whatever be the pleader's opinion of his cause, he is guilty of no breach of truth and justice in defeating the pretensions of the persons whom he opposes, by evincing that they have not made good the terms on which alone they could be legally entitled, on which alone they could suppose themselves entitled, to success."* There is something specious in this reasoning, but what is its amount?—that if the laws of a country proceed upon such and such maxims, they exempt us from the authority of the laws of God. We arrive at this often refuted doctrine at last. Either the acts of a legislature may suspend the obligations of morality or they may not. If they may, there is an end of that morality which is founded upon the Divine will: if they may not, the argument of Gisborne is a fallacy. But in truth he himself shows its fallaciousness: he says, "If a cause should present itself of an aspect so dark as to leave the advocate no reasonable doubt of its being founded in iniquity or baseness, or to justify extremely strong suspicions of its evil nature and tendency, he is bound in the sight of God to refuse all connection with the business." Why is he thus bound to refuse? Because he will otherwise violate the moral law: and this is the very reason why he is bound in other cases. Observe too the inconsistency: first we are told that whatever be the pleader's opinion of a cause, "he is guilty of no breach of truth and justice" in advocating it; and afterwards, that if the cause is of an "evil nature and tendency" he may not advocate it! That such reasoning does not prove what it is designed to prove is evident; but it proves something else—that the practice cannot be defended. Such reasoning would not be advanced if better could be found. Let us not, however seem to avail ourselves of a writer's words without reference to his meaning. The meaning in the present instance is clearly this—that a pleader, generally, may undertake a vicious cause; but that if it be very vicious, he must refrain. You may abet an act of a certain shade of iniquity, but not if it be of a certain shade deeper: you may violate the moral law to a certain extent, but not to every extent. To him who would recommend rectitude in its purity, few reasonings are more satisfactory than such as these. They prove the truth which they assail by evincing that it cannot be disproved.

* Duties of men. The Legal Profession.

Dr. Johnson tried a shorter course: "You do not know a cause to be good or bad till the judge determines it. An argument that does not convince you may convince the judge to whom you urge it, and if it does convince him, why then he is right and you are wrong." This is satisfactory. It is always satisfactory to perceive that a powerful intellect can find nothing but idle sophistry to urge against the obligations of virtue. One other argument is this: Eminent barristers, it is said, should not be too scrupulous, because clients might fear their causes would be rejected by virtuous pleaders, and might therefore go to "needy and unprincipled chicaners." Why, if their causes were good, virtuous pleaders would undertake them; and if they were bad, it matters not how soon they were discountenanced. In a right state of things, the very circumstance that only an "unprincipled chicaner" would undertake a particular cause, would go far towards procuring a verdict against it. Besides, it is a very loose morality that recommends good men to do improper things lest they should be done by the bad.

Seeing therefore that no tolerable defence can be adduced of the ordinary legal practice, let us consider for a moment what are its practical results.

A civil action is brought into court, and evidence has been heard which satisfies every man that the plaintiff is entitled in justice to a verdict. It is, on the part of the defendant, a clear case of dishonesty. Suddenly, the pleader discovers that there is some verbal flaw in a document, some technical irregularity in the proceedings—and the plaintiff loses his cause. The public are disappointed in their expectations of justice; the jury and the court are grieved; and the unhappy sufferer retires, injured and wronged—without redress or hope of redress. Can this be right? Can it be sufficient to justify a man in this conduct, to urge that such things are his business—the means by which he obtains his living? The same excuse would justify a corsair, or a troop of Arabian banditti which plunders the caravan. Yet indefensible, immoral, as this conduct is, it is the every day practice of the profession; and the amount of injustice which is inflicted by this practice is enormous. The plea that such are the rules of the law is not admissible. Whatever utility we may be disposed to allow to the uniform application of the law, it will not justify such conduct as this. The integrity of the law would not have been violated, though the pleader had not pointed out the mis-spelling, for example, of a word. For a judge to refuse to allow the law to take its course after the mistake has been urged, is one thing ; for a pleader to detect and to urge it, is another. The judge may not be able to regard the equity of the case without sacrificing the uniform operation of the law. But if the inadvertency is not pointed out, that uniform operation is perfect though equity be awarded. There is no excuse for thus inflicting injustice. It is an act of pure gratuitous mischief : an act not required by law, an act condemned by morality, an act possessing no apology but that the agent is tempted by the gains of his profession.

An unhappy father seeks, in a court of justice, some redress for the misery which a seducer has inflicted upon his family ; a redress which, if he were successful, is deplorably inadequate, both as a recompense to the sufferers and as a punishment to the criminal. This case is established, and it is manifest that equity and the public good require exemplary damages. What then does the pleader do? He stands up and employs every contrivance to prevent the jury from awarding these damages. He eloquently endeavors to persuade them that the act involved little guilt ; casts undeserved imputations upon the immediate sufferer and upon her family ; jests, and banters, and sneers, about all the evidence of the case : imputes bad motives (without truth or with it) to the prosecutor ; expatiates upon the little property (whether it be little or much) which the seducer possesses ; by these and by such means he labors to prevent this injured father from obtaining any redress, to secure the criminal from all punishment, and to encourage in other men the crime itself. Compassion, justice, morality, the public good, everything is sacrificed—to what? To that which, upon such a subject, it were a shame to mention.

In the criminal courts, the same conduct is practised, and with the same indefensibility. Can it be necessary, or ought it to be necessary, to insist upon the proposition—"If it be right that offenders should be punished, it is not right to make them pass with impunity." If a police officer has seized a thief and carried him to prison, every one knows that it would be vicious in me to effect his escape. Yet this is the every day practice of the profession. It is their regular and constant endeavor to prevent justice from being administered to offenders. Is it a sufficient justification of preventing the execution of justice, of preventing that which every good citizen is desirous of promoting—to say that a man is an advocate by profession? Is the circumstance of belonging to the legal profession a good reason for disregarding those duties which are obligatory upon every other man? He who wards off punishment from swindlers and robbers, and sends them amongst the public upon the work of fraud and plunder again, surely deserves worse of his country than many a hungry man who filches a loaf or a trinket from a stall. As to employing legal artifices or the tactics of declamation in order to obtain the conviction of a prisoner whom there is reason to believe to be innocent; or as to endeavoring to inflict upon him a punishment greater than his deserts, the wickedness is so palpable that it is wonderful that even the power of custom protects it from the reprobation of the world.

In Scotland, where the criminal process is in some respects superior to ours, the proportion of those prisoners who escape punishment on account of "technical niceties," is very great. Of the persons acquitted in our courts, at least one half escape from technical niceties, or rules of evidence which give advantage to the prisoner, with which, in the other part of the island, they are wholly unacquainted.”* Is not this a great public evil? And if we charge that evil originally upon the law, is it warrantable, is it moral, in the advocate actively to increase and extend it?

The plea that it is of consequence that law should be uniformly administered, does not suffice to justify the pleader in criminal any more than in civil courts. “A thief was caught coming out of a house in Highbury Terrace, with a watch he had stolen therein upon him. He was found guilty by the jury upon the clearest evidence of the theft; but his counsel having discovered that he was charged in the indictment with having stolen a watch, the property of the owner of the house, whereas the watch really belonged to his daughter, the prisoner got clear off.”† The pretext of the value of an uniform operation of the law will not avail here. Suppose the counsel, though he did discover the watch was the daughter’s, had not insisted upon the inaccuracy, no evil would have ensued. The integrity of the law would not have been violated. The act of a counsel therefore in such a case is simply and only a defeat of public justice, an injury to the State, an encouragement to thieves; and surely there is no reason, either in morals or in common sense, why any particular class of men should be privileged thus to injure the community.

The wife of a respectable tradesman in the town in which I live was left a widow with eight or ten children. She employed a confidential person to assist in conducting the business. The business was flourishing; and yet at the end of every year she was surprised and afflicted to find that her profits were unaccountably small. At length this confidential person was suspected of peculation. Money was marked and placed as usual under his care. It was soon missed and found upon his person ; and when the police searched his house, they found in his possession, methodically stowed away, five or six thousand pounds, the accumulated plunder of years ! This cruel and atrocious robber found no difficulty in obtaining advocates, who employed every artifice of defence, who had recourse to every technicality of law, to screen him from punishment and to secure for him the quiet possession of his plunder. They found in the indictment some word, of which the ordinary and the legal acceptation were different ; and the indictment was quashed ! Happily, another was proof against the casuistry, and the criminal was found guilty.

* Remarks on the Administration of Criminal Justice in Scotland, etc.

† West. Rev. No. 8, Art. I.

Will it be said that pleaders are not supposed to know, till the verdict is pronounced, whether a prisoner is guilty or not ? If this were true, it would not avail as a justification ; but, in reality, it is only a subterfuge. In this very case, after the verdict had been pronounced, after the prisoner's guilt had been ascertained, a new trial was obtained ; not on account of any doubt in the evidence—that was unequivocal—but on account of some irregularity in passing sentence. And now the same conduct was repeated. Knowing that the prisoner was guilty, advocates still exerted their talents and eloquence to procure impunity for him, nay to reward him at the expense of public duty and of private justice. They did not succeed : the plunderer was transported ; but their want of success does not diminish the impropriety, the immorality, of their endeavors. If, by the trickery of law, this man had obtained an acquittal, what would have been the consequence ? Not merely that he would have possessed, undisturbed, his plundered thousands ; not merely that he might have laughed at the family whose money he was spending ; but that a hundred or a thousand other shopmen, taking confidence from his success and his impunity, might enter upon a similar course of treachery and fraud. They might think that if the hour of detection should arrive, nothing was wanting but a sagacious advocate to protect them from punishment, and to secure their spoil. Will any man then say, as an excuse for the legal practice, that it is "usual," "customary," the "business of the profession?" It is preposterous.*

It really is a dreadful consideration, that a body of men, respectable in the various relationships of life, should make, in consequence of the vicious maxims of a profession, these deplorable sacrifices of rectitude. To a writer upon such a subject, it is difficult to speak with that plainness which morality requires without seeming to speak illiberally of men. But it is not a question of liberality but of morals. When a barrister arrives at an assize town on the circuit, and tacitly publishes that (abating a few, and only a few, cases) he is willing to take the brief of any client; that he is ready to employ his abilities, his ingenuity, in proving that any given cause is good or that it is bad; and when, having gone before a jury, he urges the side on which he happens to have been employed, with all the earnestness of seeming integrity and truth, and bends all the faculties which God has given him in promotion of its success; when we see all this, and remember that it was the toss of a die whether he should have done exactly the contrary, I think that no expression characterizes the procedure but that of intellectual and moral prostitution. In any other place than a court of justice, every one would say that it was prostitution: a court of justice cannot make it less.

* Some obstacles in the way of this mode of defeating the ends of justice have been happily interposed by the admirable exertions of the late Secretary of State for the Home Department. Still such cases are applicable as illustrations of what the duties of the profession are; and, unfortunately, opportunities in abundance remain for sacrificing the duties of the profession to its "business." Here, without any advertence to political opinion, it may be remarked, that one such statesman as Robert Peel is of more value to his country than a multitude of those who take office and leave it without any endeavor to ameliorate the national institutions.

Perhaps the reader has heard of the pleader who, by some accident, mistook the side on which he was to argue, and earnestly contended for the opponent's cause. His distressed client at length conveyed an intimation of his mistake, and he, with forensic dexterity told the jury that hitherto he had only been anticipating the arguments of the opposing counsel, and that now he would proceed to show they were fallacious. If the reader should imagine there is peculiar indecency in this, his sentiment would be founded upon habit rather than upon reason. There is, really, very little difference between contending for both sides of the same cause, and contending for either side, as the earliest retainer may decide. I lately read the report of a trial in which retainers from both parties had been sent to a counsel, and when the cause was brought into court it was still undecided for whom he should appear. The scale was turned by the judgment of another counsel, and the pleader instantly appeared on behalf of the client to whom his brother had allotted him.

Probably it will be asked, What is a legal man to do? How shall he discriminate his duties, or know, in the present state of legal institutions, what extent of advocacy morality allows? These are fair questions, and he who asks them is entitled to an answer. I confess that an answer is difficult: and why is it difficult? Because the whole system is unsound. He who would rectify the ordinary legal practice, is in the situation of a physician who can scarcely prescribe with effect for a particular symptom in a patient's case, unless he will submit to an entirely new regimen and mode of life. The conscientious lawyer is surrounded with temptations and with difficulties resulting from the general system of the law; difficulties and temptations so great that it may almost appear to be the part of a wise man to fly rather than to encounter them. There is however nothing necessarily incidental to the legal profession which makes it incompatible with morality. He who has the firmness to maintain his allegiance to virtue may doubtless maintain it. Such a man would consider, that law being in general the practical standard of equity, the pleader may properly illustrate and enforce it. He may assiduously examine statutes and precedents, and honorably adduce them on behalf of his client. He may distinctly and luminously exhibit his client's claims. In examining his witnesses he may educe the whole truth: in examining the other party's, he may endeavor to detect collusion, and to elicit facts which they may attempt to conceal; in a word, he may lay before the court a just and lucid view of the whole question. But he may not quote statutes and adjudged cases which he really does not think apply to the subject, or if they do appear to apply, he may not urge them as possessing greater force or applicability than he really thinks they possess. He may not endeavor to mislead the jury by appealing to their feelings, by employing ridicule, and especially by unfounded insinuations or misrepresentation of facts. He may not endeavor to make his own witnesses affirm more than he thinks they know, or induce them, by artful questions, to give a coloring to facts different from the coloring of truth. He may not endeavor to conceal or discredit the truth by attempting to confuse the other witnesses, or by entrapping them into contradictions. Such as these appear to be the rules which rectitude imposes in ordinary cases. There are some cases which a professional man ought not to undertake at all. This is indeed acknowledged by numbers of the profession. The obligation to reject them is of course founded upon their contrariety to virtue. How then shall a legal man know whether he ought to undertake a cause at all, but by some previous consideration of its merits. This must really be done if he would conform to the requisitions of morality. There is not an alternative: and "absurd" or "impracticable" as it may be pronounced to be, we do not shrink from explicitly maintaining the truth. Impracticable! it is at any rate not impracticable to withdraw from the profession or to decline to enter it. A man is not compelled to be a lawyer: and if there are so many difficulties in the practice of professional virtue, what is to be said? Are we to say, Virtue must be sacrificed to a profession—or, The profession must be sacrificed to virtue? The pleader will perhaps say that he cannot tell what the merits of a case are until they are elicited in court: but this surely would not avail to justify a disregard of morality in any other case. To defend one's self for an habitual disregard of the claims of rectitude, because we cannot tell, when we begin a course of action, whether it will involve a sacrifice of rectitude or not, is an ill defence indeed. At any rate, if he connects himself with a cause of questionable rectitude, he needs not and he ought not to advocate it, whilst ignorant of its merits, as if he knew that it was good. He ought not to advocate it further than he thinks it is good.

There is one consideration under which a pleader may assist a client even with a bad cause, which is, that it is proper to prevent the client from suffering too far. I would acknowledge, generally, the justice of the opposite party's claims, or, if it were a criminal case, I would acquiesce in the evidence which carried conviction to my mind ; but still, in both, something may remain for the pleader to do. The plaintiff may demand a thousand pounds when only eight hundred are due, and a pleader, though he could not with integrity resist the whole demand, could resist the excess of the demand above the just amount. Or if the prosecutor urges the guilt of a prisoner and attempts to procure the infliction of an undue punishment, a pleader, though he knows the prisoner's guilt, may rightly prevent a sentence too severe. Murray, the grammarian, had been a barrister in America : " I do not recollect," says he, " that I ever encouraged a client to proceed at law when I thought his cause was unjust or indefensible ; but in such cases, I believe it was my invariable practice to discourage litigation and to recommend a peaceable settlement of differences. In the retrospect of this mode of practice, I have always had great satisfaction, and I am persuaded that a different procedure would have been the source of many painful recollections."*

One serious consideration remains—the effect of the immorality of legal practice upon the personal character of the profession. " The lawyer who is frequently engaged in resisting what he strongly suspects to be just, in maintaining what he deems to be in strictness untenable, in advancing inconclusive reasoning, and seeking after flaws in the sound replies of his antagonists, can be preserved by nothing short of serious and invariable solicitude, from the risk of having the distinction between moral right and wrong almost erased from his mind."† Is it indeed so? Tremendous is the risk. Is it indeed so? Then the custom which entails this fearful risk must infallibly be bad.

* Memoirs of Lindley Murray, p. 43.

† Gisborne.

Assuredly no virtuous conduct tends to erase the distinctions between right and wrong from the mind.

---

It is by no means certain, that if a lawyer were to enter upon life with a steady determination to act upon the principles of strict integrity, his experience would occasion any exception to the general rule, that the path of virtue is the path of interest. The client who was conscious of the goodness of his cause, would prefer the advocate whose known maxims of conduct gave weight to every cause that he undertook. When such a man appeared before a jury, they would attend to his statements and his reasonings with that confidence which integrity only can inspire. They would not make, as they now do, perpetual deductions from his averred facts; they would not be upon the watch, as they now are, to protect themselves from illusion, and casuistry, and misrepresentation. Such a man, I say, would have a weight of advocacy which no other qualification can supply; and upright clients, knowing this would find it their interest to employ him. The majority of clients, it is to be hoped, are upright. Professional success, therefore, would probably follow. And if a few such pleaders, nay if one such pleader was established, the consequence might be beneficial and extensive to a degree which it is not easy to compute. It might soon become necessary for other pleaders to act upon the same principles, because clients would not entrust their interests to any but those whose characters would give weight to their advocacy. Thus even the profligate part of the profession might be reformed by motives of interest if not from choice. Want of credit might be want of practice; for it might eventually be almost equivalent to the loss of a cause to entrust it to a bad man. The effects would extend to the public. If none but upright men could be efficient advocates, and if upright men would not advocate vicious causes, vicious causes would not be prosecuted. But if such be the probable or even the possible results of sterling integrity, if it might be the means of reforming the practice of a large and influential profession, and of almost exterminating wicked litigation from a people—the obligation to practise this integrity is proportionately great: the amount of depending good involves a corresponding amount of responsibility upon him who contributes to perpetuate the evil.

---

CHAPTER VI.

PROMISES.—LIES.

PROMISES.—Definition of a promise—Parole—Extorted promises—John Fletcher.

LIES.—Milton's definition—Lies in war: to robbers: to lunatics: to the sick—Hyperbole—Irony—Complimentary untruths—"Not at home."

A PROMISE is a contract, differing from such contracts as a lawyer would draw up, in the circumstance that ordinarily it is not written. The motive for signing a contract is to give assurance or security to the receiver that its terms will be fulfilled. The same motive is the inducement to a promise. The general obligation of promises needs little illustration, because it is not disputed. Men are not left without the consciousness that what they promise, they ought to perform; and thus thousands, who can give no philosophical account of the matter, know, with certain assurance, that if they violate their engagements they violate the law of God.

Some philosophers deduce the obligation of promises from the expediency of fulfilling them. Doubtless fulfilment is expedient; but there is a shorter and a safer road to truth. To promise and not to perform, is to deceive; and deceit is peculiarly and especially condemned by Christianity. A lie has been defined to be "a breach of promise;" and, since the Scriptures condemn lying, they condemn breaches of promise.

Persons sometimes deceive others by making a promise in a sense different from that in which they know it will be understood. They hope this species of deceit is less criminal than breaking their word, and wish to gain the advantage of deceiving without its guilt. They dislike the shame but perform the act. A son has abandoned his father's house, and the father promises that if he returns, he shall be received with open arms. The son returns, the father "opens his arms" to receive him, and then proceeds to treat him with rigor. This father falsifies his promise as truly as if he had specifically engaged to treat him with kindness. The sense in which a promise binds a person, is the sense in which he knows it is accepted by the other party.

It is very possible to promise without speaking. Those who purchase at auctions frequently advance on the price by a sign or a nod. An auctioneer, in selling an estate says, "Nine hundred and ninety pounds are offered." He who makes the customary sign to indicate an advance of ten pounds, promises to give a thousand.—A person who brings up his children or others in the known and encouraged expectation that he will provide for them, promises to provide for them. A shipmaster promises to deliver a pipe of wine at the accustomed port, although he may have made no written and no verbal engagement respecting it.

Parole, such as is taken of military men, is of imperative obligation. The prisoner who escapes by breach of parole, ought to be regarded as the perpetrator of an aggravated crime: aggravated, since his word was accepted, as he knows, because peculiar reliance was placed upon it, and since he adds to the ordinary guilt of breach of promise, that of casting suspicion and entailing suffering upon other men. If breach of parole were general, parole would not be taken. It is one of the anomalies which are presented by the adherents to the law of honor, that they do not reject from their society the man who impeaches their respectability and his own, whilst they reject the man who really impeaches neither the one nor the other.—To say I am a man of honor and therefore you may rely upon my word; and then, as soon as it is accepted to violate that word is no ordinary deceit. An upright man never broke parole.

Promises are not binding if performance is unlawful. Sometimes men promise to commit a wicked act—even to assassination; but a man is not required to commit murder because he has promised to commit it. Thus, in the Christian Scriptures, the son who had said, “I will not” work in the vineyard, and “afterwards repented and went,” is spoken of with approbation: his promise was not binding, because fulfilment would have been wrong. Cranmer, whose religious firmness was overcome in the prospect of the stake, recanted; that is, he promised to abandon the protestant faith. Neither was his promise binding. To have regarded it would have been a crime. The offence both of Cranmer and of the son in the parable, consisted not in violating their promises, but in making them.

Some scrupulous persons appear to attach a needless obligation to expressions which they employ in the form of promises. You ask a lady if she will join a party in a walk; she declines, but presently recollect-ing some inducement to go, she is in doubt whether her refusal does not oblige her to stay at home. Such a person should recollect, that her refusal does not partake of the character of a promise: there is no other party to it; she comes under no engagement to another. She only expresses her present intention, which intention she is at liberty to alter.

Many promises are conditional though the conditions are not expressed. A man says to some friends, I will dine with you at two o'clock; but as he is preparing to go his child meets with an accident which requires his attention. This man does not violate a promise by absenting himself, because such promises are in fact made and accepted with the tacit understanding that they are subject to such conditions. No one would expect, when his friend engaged to dine with him, that he intended to bind himself to come, though he left a child unassisted with a fractured arm. Accordingly, when a person means to exclude such conditions he says, "I will certainly do so and so if I am living and able."

Yet even to seem to disregard an engagement is an evil. To an ingenuous and Christian mind there is always something painful in not performing it. Of this evil the principal source is gratuitously brought upon us by the habit of using unconditional terms for conditional engagements. That which is only intention should be expressed as intention. It is better, and more becoming the condition of humanity, to say, I intend to do a thing, than, I will do a thing. The recollection of our dependency upon uncontrollable circumstances should be present with us even in little affairs—"Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city and buy and sell and get gain: whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow.—Ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that." Not indeed that the sacred name of God is to be introduced to express the conditions of our little engagements; but the principle should never be forgotten—that we know not what shall be on the morrow.

Respecting the often discussed question, whether extorted promises are binding, there has been, I suspect, a general want of advertence to one important point. What is an extorted promise? If by an extorted promise, is meant a promise that is made involuntarily, without the concurrence of the will; if it is the effect of any ungovernable impulse, and made without the consciousness of the party—then it is not a promise. This may happen. Fear or agitation may be so great that a person really does not know what he says or does; and in such a case a man's promises do not bind him any more than the promises of a man in a fit of insanity. But if by an "extorted" promise it is only meant that very powerful inducements were held out to making it, inducements however which did not take away the power of choice—then these promises are in strictness voluntary, and like all other voluntary engagements, they ought to be fulfilled. But perhaps fulfilment itself is unlawful. Then you may not fulfil it. The offence consists in making such engagements. It will be said, a robber threatened to take my life unless I would promise to reveal the place where my neighbor's money was deposited. Ought I not to make the promise in order to save my life? No. Here, in reality, is the origin of the difficulties and the doubts. To rob your neighbor is criminal; to enable another man to rob him is criminal too. Instead, therefore, of discussing the obligation of "extorted" promises, we should consider whether such promises may lawfully be made. The prospect of saving life is one of the utmost inducements to make them, and yet, amongst those things which we are to hold subservient to our Christian fidelity, is our "own life also." If, however, giving way to the weakness of nature, a person makes the promise, he should regulate his performance by the ordinary principles. Fulfil the promise unless fulfilment be wrong: and if, in estimating the propriety of fulfilling it, any difficulty arises, it must be charged not to the imperfection of moral principles, but to the entanglement in which we involve ourselves by having begun to deviate from rectitude. If we had not unlawfully made the promise we should have had no difficulty in ascertaining our subsequent duty. The traveller who does not desert the proper road, easily finds his way; he who once loses sight of it, has many difficulties in returning.

The history of that good man John Fletcher (La Flechère) affords an example to our purpose. Fletcher had a brother, De Gons, and a nephew, a profligate youth. This youth came one day to his uncle De Gons, and holding up a pistol, declared he would instantly shoot him if he did not give him an order for five hundred crowns. De Gons in terror gave it; and the nephew then, under the same threat, required him solemnly to promise that he would not prosecute him; and De Gons made the promise accordingly. That is what is called an extorted promise, and an extorted gift. How, in similar circumstances, did Fletcher act? This youth afterwards went to him, told him of the "present" which De Gons had made, and showed him the order. Fletcher suspected some fraud, and thinking it right to prevent its success, he put the order in his pocket. It was at the risk of his life. The young man instantly presented his pistol, declaring that he would fire if he did not deliver it up. Fletcher did not submit to the extortion: he told him that his life was secure under the protection of God, refused to deliver up the order, and severely remonstrated with his nephew on his profligacy. The young man was restrained and softened; and before he left his uncle, gave him many assurances that he would amend his life.—De Gons might have been perplexed with doubts as to the obligation of his “extorted” promise:—Fletcher could have no doubts to solve.

LIES.

THE guilt of lying, like that of many other offences, has been needlessly founded upon its ill effects. These effects constitute a good reason for adhering to truth, but they are not the greatest nor the best. “Putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor.”* “Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another.”† “The law is made for unholy and profane, for murderers—for liars.”‡ It may afford the reader some instruction, to observe with what crimes lying is associated in Scripture—with perjury, and murder, and parricide. Not that it is necessary to suppose that the measure of guilt of these crimes is equal, but that the guilt of all is great. With respect to lying, there is no trace in these passages that its guilt is conditional upon its effects, or that it is not always, and for whatever purpose, prohibited by the Divine will.

A lie is, uttering what is not true when the speaker professes to utter truth, or when he knows it is expected by the hearer. I do not perceive that any looser definition is allowable, because every looser definition would permit deceit.

Milton’s definition, considering the general tenor of his character, was very lax. He says, “Falsehood is incurred when any one, from a dishonest motive, either perverts the truth or utters what is false to one to whom it is his duty to speak the truth.”* To whom is it not our duty to speak the truth? What constitutes duty but the will of God? and where is it found that it is his will that we should sometimes lie!—But another condition is proposed: In order to constitute a lie, the motive to it must be dishonest. Is not all deceit dishonesty; and can any one utter a lie without deceit? A man who travels in the Arctic regions comes home and writes a narrative professedly faithful, of his adventures, and decorates it with marvellous incidents which never happened, and stories of wonders which he never saw. You tell this man he has been passing lies upon the public. Oh no, he says, I had not “a dishonest motive.” I only meant to make readers wonder.—Milton’s mode of substantiating his doctrine, is worthy of remark. He makes many references for authority to the Hebrew Scriptures, but not one to the Christian. The reason is plain though perhaps he was not aware of it, that the purer moral system which the Christian lawgiver introduced, did not countenance the doctrine. Another argument is so feeble that it may well be concluded no valid argument can be found. If it had been discoverable would not Milton have found it? He says, “It is universally admitted that feints and stratagems in war, when unaccompanied by perjury or breach of faith, do not fall under the description of falsehood.—It is scarcely possible to execute any of the artifices of war, without openly uttering the greatest untruths with the indisputable intention of deceiving.”† And so, because the “greatest untruths” are uttered in conducting one of the most flagitious departments of the most unchristian system in the world, we are told, in a system of Christian doctrine, that untruths are lawful!

* Eph. iv. 25.

† Lev. xix. 11.

‡ 1 Tim. i. 9, 10.

* Christian Doctrine, p. 658.

† Id. 659.

Paley's philosophy is yet more lax : he says that we may tell a falsehood to a person who "has no right to know the truth."* What constitutes a right to know the truth it were not easy to determine. But if a man has no right to know the truth— withhold it ; but do not utter a lie. A man has no right to know how much property I possess. If, however, he impertinently chooses to ask, what am I to do? Refuse to tell him, says Christian morality. What am I to do? Tell him it is ten times as great as it is, says the morality of Paley.

To say that when a man is tempted to employ a falsehood, he is to consider the degree of "inconveniency which results from the want of confidence in such cases,"† and to employ the falsehood or not as this degree shall prescribe, is surely to trifle with morality. What is the hope that a man will decide aright, who sets about such a calculation at such a time? Another kind of falsehood which it is said is lawful, is that "to a robber, to conceal your property." A man gets into my house, and desires to know where he shall find my plate. I tell him it is in the chest in such a room, knowing that it is in a closet in another. By such a falsehood I might save my property or possibly my life; but if the prospect of doing this be a sufficient reason for violating the moral law, there is no action which we may not lawfully commit. May a person, in order so to save his property or life, commit parricide? Every reader says, No. But where is the ground of the distinction? If you may lie for the sake of such advantages, why may you not kill? What makes murder unlawful but that which makes lying unlawful too? No man surely will say that we must make distinctions in the atrocity of such actions, and that though it is not lawful for the sake of advantage to commit an act of a certain intensity of guilt, yet it is lawful to commit one of a certain gradation less. Such doctrine would be purely gratuitous and unfounded : it would be equivalent to saying that we are at liberty to disobey the Divine laws when we think fit. The case is very simple : If I may tell a falsehood to a robber in order to save my property, I may commit parricide for the same purpose ; for lying and parricide are placed together and jointly condemned * in the revelation from God.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 3. p. 1. c. 15. † Id.

Then we are told that we may “ tell a falsehood to a madman for his own advantage,” and this because it is beneficial. Dr. Carter may furnish an answer : he speaks of the Female Lunatic Asylum, Saltpetriere in Paris, and says, “ The great object to which the views of the officers of La Saltpetriere are directed, is to gain the confidence of the patients ; and this object is generally attained by gentleness, by appearing to take an interest in their affairs, by a decision of character equally remote from the extremes of indulgence and severity, and by the most scrupulous observance of good faith. Upon this latter, particular stress seems to be laid by M. Pinel, who remarks ‘ that insane persons, like children, lose all confidence and all respect if you fail in your word towards them ; and they immediately set their ingenuity to work to deceive and circumvent you.’ ” † What then becomes of the doctrine of “ telling falsehoods to madmen for their own advantage? ” It is pleasant thus to find the evidence of experience enforcing the dictates of principle, and that what morality declares to be right, facts declare to be expedient.

Persons frequently employ falsehoods to a sick man who cannot recover, lest it should discompose his mind. This is called kindness, although an earnest preparation for death may be at stake upon their speaking the truth. There is a peculiar inconsistency sometimes exhibited on such occasions: the persons who will not discompose a sick man for the sake of his interests in futurity, will discompose him without scruple if he has not made his will. Is a bequest of more consequence to the survivor, than a hope full of immortality to the dying man?

* 1 Tim. i. 9, 10.

† Account of the Principal Hospitals in France, &c.

It is curious to remark how zealously persons reprobate "pious frauds;" that is, lies for the religious benefit of the deceived party. Surely if any reason for employing falsehood be a good one, it is the prospect of effecting religious benefit. How is it then that we so freely condemn these falsehoods, whilst we contend for others which are used for less important purposes?

Still, not every expression that is at variance with facts is a lie, because there are some expressions in which the speaker does not pretend, and the hearer does not expect, literal truth. Of this class are hyperboles and jests, fables and tales of professed fiction: of this class too, are parables, such as are employed in the New Testament. In such cases affirmative language is used in the same terms as if the allegations were true, yet as it is known that it does not profess to narrate facts, no lie is uttered. It is the same with some kinds of irony: "Cry aloud," said Elijah to the priests of the idol, "for he is a god, peradventure he sleepeth." And yet, because a given untruth is not a lie, it does not therefore follow, that it is innocent: for it is very possible to employ such expressions without any sufficient justification. A man who thinks he can best inculcate virtue through a fable, may write one: he who desires to discountenance an absurdity, may employ irony. Yet every one should use as little of such language as he can, because it is frequently dangerous language. The man who familiarizes himself to a departure from literal truth, is in danger of departing from it without reason and without excuse. Some of these departures are like lies; so much like them that both speaker and hearer may reasonably question whether they are lies or not. The lapse from untruths which can deceive no one, to those which are intended to deceive, proceeds by almost imperceptible gradations on the scale of evil: and it is not the part of wisdom to approach the verge of guilt. Nor is it to be forgotten, that language, professedly fictitious, is not always understood to be such by those who hear it. This applies especially to the case of children—that is, of mankind during that period of life in which they are acquiring some of their first notions of morality. The boy who hears his father using hyperboles and irony with a grave countenance, probably thinks he has his father's example for telling lies among his schoolfellows.

Amongst the indefensible untruths which often are not lies are those which factitious politeness enjoins. Such are compliments and complimentary subscriptions, and many other untruths of expression and of action which pass currently in the world. These are, no doubt, often estimated at their value: the receiver knows that they are base coin though they shine like the good. Now, although it is not to be pretended that such expressions, so estimated, are lies, yet I will venture to affirm that the reader cannot set up for them any tolerable defence; and if he cannot show that they are right he may be quite sure that they are wrong. A defence has however been attempted: "How much is happiness increased by the general adoption of a system of concerted and limited deceit! He from whose doctrine it flows that we are to be in no case hypocrites, would, in mere manners, reduce us to a degree of barbarism beyond that of the rudest savage." We do not enter here into such questions as whether a man may smile when his friend calls upon him, though he would rather just then that he had staid away. Whatever the reader may think of these questions, the "system of deceit" which passes in the world cannot be justified by the decision. There is no fear that "a degree of barbarism beyond that of the rudest savage" would ensue, if this system were amended. The first teachers of Christianity, who will not be charged with being in "any case hypocrites," both recommended and practised gentleness and courtesy.* And as to the increase of happiness which is assumed to result from this system of deceit, the fact is of a very questionable kind. No society I believe sufficiently discourages it; but that society which discourages it probably as much as any other, certainly enjoys its full average of happiness. But the apology proceeds, and more seriously errs: "The employment of falsehood for the production of good, cannot be more unworthy of the Divine Being than the acknowledged employment of rapine and murder for the same purpose." † Is it then not perceived that to employ the wickedness of man is a very different thing from holding its agents innocent? Some of those whose wickedness has been thus employed, have been punished for that wickedness. Even to show that the Deity has employed falsehood for the production of good, would in no degree establish the doctrine that falsehood is right.

The childish and senseless practice of requiring servants to "deny" their masters, has had many apologists—I suppose because many perceive that it is wrong. It is not always true that such a servant does not in strictness lie; for, how well soever the folly may be understood by the gay world, some who knock at their doors have no other idea than that they may depend upon the servant's word. Of this the servant is sometimes conscious, and to these persons therefore he who denies his master, lies. An uninitiated servant suffers a shock to his moral principles when he is first required to tell these falsehoods. It diminishes his previous abhorrence of lying, and otherwise deteriorates his moral character. Even if no such ill consequences resulted from this foolish custom, there is objection to it which is short, but sufficient—nothing can be said in its defence.

* 1 Peter, ii. 1. Tit. iii. 2. 1 Peter, iii. 8.

† Edin. Rev. vol. 1, Art. Belsham's Philosophy of the Mind.

---

CHAPTER VII.

OATHS.

THEIR MORAL CHARACTER—THEIR EFFICACY AS SECURITIES OF VERACITY—THEIR EFFECTS.

A curse—Immorality of oaths—Oaths of the ancient Jews—Milton—Paley—The High Priest's adjuration—Early Christians—Inefficacy of oaths—Motives to veracity—Religious sanctions: Public opinion; Legal penalties—Oaths in Evidence: Parliamentary Evidence: Courts Martial—The United States—Effects of oaths: Falsehood—General obligations.

“An oath is that whereby we call God to witness the truth of what we say, with a curse upon ourselves, either implied or expressed, should it prove false.”*

A CURSE.—Now supposing the Christian Scriptures to contain no information respecting the moral character of oaths, how far is it reasonable, or prudent, or

* Milton: Christian Doctrine, p. 579.

- reverent, for a man to stake his salvation upon the truth of what he says? To bring forward so tremendous an event as "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," in attestation of the offence perhaps of a poacher or of the claim to a field, is surely to make unwarrantably light of the most awful things. This consideration applies, even if a man is sure that he speaks the truth; but, who is, beforehand, sure of this? Oaths in evidence, for example, are taken before the testimony is given. A person swears that he will speak the truth. Who, I ask, is sure that he will do this? Who is sure that the embarrassment of a public examination, that the ensnaring questions of counsel, that the secret influence of inclination or interest, will not occasion him to utter one inaccurate expression? Who, at any rate, is so sure of this that it is rational, or justifiable, specifically to stake his salvation upon his accuracy? Thousands of honest men have been mistaken; their allegations have been sincere, but untrue. And if this should be thought not a legitimate objection, let it be remembered, that few men's minds are so sternly upright, that they can answer a variety of questions upon subjects on which their feelings, and wishes, and interest are involved, without some little deduction from the truth, in speaking of matters that are against their cause, or some little overcoloring of facts in their own favor. It is a circumstance of constant occurrence, that even a well-intentioned witness adds to or deducts a little from the truth. Who then, amidst such temptation, would make, who ought to make, his hope of heaven dependent on his strict adherence to accurate veracity? And if such considerations indicate the impropriety of swearing upon subjects which affect the lives, and liberties, and property of others, how shall we estimate the impropriety of using these dreadful imprecations to attest the delivery of a summons for a debt of half-a-crown !

These are moral objections to the use of oaths independently of any reference to the direct moral law. Another objection of the same kind is this : To take an oath is to assume that the Deity will become a party in the case—that we can call upon Him, when we please, to follow up by the exercise of his almighty power, the contracts (often the very insignificant contracts) which men make with men. Is it not irreverent, and for that reason immoral, to call upon Him to exercise this power in reference to subjects which are so insignificant that other men will scarcely listen with patience to their details? The objection goes even further. A robber exacts an oath of the man whom he has plundered, that he will not attempt to pursue or prosecute him. Pursuit and prosecution are duties ; so then the oath assumes that the Deity will punish the swearer in futurity if he fulfils a duty. Confederates in a dangerous and wicked enterprise bind one another to secrecy and to mutual assistance, by oaths—assuming that God will become a party to their wickedness, and if they do not perpetrate it will punish them for their virtue.

Upon every subject of questionable rectitude that is sanctioned by habit and the usages of society, a person should place himself in the independent situation of an enquirer. He should not seek for arguments to defend an existing practice, but should simply enquire what our practice ought to be. One of the most powerful causes of the slow amendment of public institutions, consists in this circumstance, that most men endeavor rather to justify what exists than to consider whether it ought to exist or not. This cause operates upon the question of oaths. We therefore invite the reader, in considering the citation which follows, to suppose himself to be one of the listeners at the Mount —to know nothing of the customs of the present day; and to have no desire to justify them.

“Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths. But I say unto you, Swear not at all : neither by heaven for it is God’s throne, nor by the earth for it is his footstool, neither by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay ; for whatsoever is more than these, cometh of evil.”*

If a person should take a New Testament, and read these words to ten intelligent Asiatics who had never heard of them before, does any man believe that a single individual of them would think that the words did not prohibit all oaths? I lay stress upon this consideration : if ten unbiassed persons would, at the first hearing, say the prohibition was universal, we have no contemptible argument that that is the real meaning of the words. For to whom were the words addressed? Not to schoolmen, of whom it was known that they would make nice distinctions and curious investigations ; not to men of learning, who were in the habit of cautiously weighing the import of words—but to a multitude—a mixed and unschooled multitude. It was to such persons that the prohibition was addressed ; it was to such apprehensions that its form was adapted.

“It hath been said of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself.” Why refer to what was said of old time? For this reason assuredly ; to point out that the present requisitions were different from the former ; that what was prohibited now was different from what was prohibited before. And what was prohibited before? Swearing falsely—Swearing and not performing.

* Matt. v. 33—37.

What then could be prohibited now? Swearing truly—Swearing, even, and performing : that is, swearing at all ; for it is manifest that if truth may not be attested by an oath, no oath may be taken. Of old time it was said, “Ye shall not swear by my name falsely.”* “If a man swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond, he shall not break his word.” † There could be no intelligible purpose in contradistinguishing the new precept from these, but to point out a characteristic difference ; and there is no intelligible characteristic difference but that which denounces all oaths. Such were the views of the early Christians. “The old law,” says one of them, “is satisfied with the honest keeping of the oath, but Christ cuts off the opportunity of perjury.” ‡ In acknowledging that this prefatory reference to the former law, is in my view absolutely conclusive of our Christian duty, I would remark as an extraordinary circumstance, that Dr. Paley, in citing the passage, omits this introduction and takes no notice of it in his argument.

“I say unto you, Swear not at all.” The words are absolute and exclusive.

“Neither by heaven, nor by the earth, nor by Jerusalem, nor by thy own head.” Respecting this enumeration it is said that it prohibits swearing by certain objects, but not by all objects. To which a sufficient answer is found in the parallel passage in James : “Swear not,” he says ; “neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath.”§ This mode of prohibition, by which an absolute and universal rule is first proposed and then followed by certain examples of the prohibited things, is elsewhere employed in Scripture. “Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any

* Lev. xix. 12.

† Numb. xxx. 2.

‡ Basil.

§ James v. 12.

graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." * No man supposes that this after-enumeration was designed to restrict the obligation of the law—Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Yet it were as reasonable to say that it was lawful to make idols in the form of imaginary monsters because they were not mentioned in the enumeration, as that it is lawful to swear any given kind of oath because it is not mentioned in the enumeration. Upon this part of the prohibition it is curious that two contradictory opinions are advanced by the defenders of oaths. The first class of reasoners says, The prohibition allows us to swear by the Deity, but disallows swearing by inferior things. The second class says, The prohibition allows swearing by inferior things, but disallows swearing by the Deity. Of the first class is Milton. The injunction, he says, "does not prohibit us from swearing by the name of God—We are only commanded not to swear by heaven, &c." † But here again the Scripture itself furnishes a conclusive answer. It asserts that to swear by heaven is to swear by the Deity: "He that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by Him that sitteth thereon." ‡ To prohibit swearing by heaven, is therefore to prohibit swearing by God.—Amongst the second class is Dr. Paley. He says, "On account of the relation which these things, [the heavens, the earth, &c.] bore to the Supreme Being, to swear by any of them was in effect and substance to swear by Him; for which reason our Saviour says, Swear not at all; that is, neither directly by God nor indirectly by anything related to him." § But if we are thus prohibited from swearing by any thing related to Him, how happens it that Paley proceeds to justify judicial oaths? Does not the judicial deponent swear by something related to God? Does he not swear by something much more nearly related than the earth or our own heads? Is not our hope of salvation more nearly related than a member of our bodies?—But after he has thus taken pains to show that swearing by the Almighty was especially forbidden, he enforces his general argument by saying that Christ did swear by the Almighty! He says that the high priest examined our Saviour upon oath, “by the living God;” which oath he took. This is wonderful; and the more wonderful because of these two arguments the one immediately follows the other. It is contended, within half a dozen lines, first that Christ forbade swearing by God, and next that he violated his own command.

* Exod. xx. 3, 4. † Christ. Doc. p. 582.

‡ Matt. xxiii. 22. § Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 3, p. 1, c. 16.

“But let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay.” This is remarkable: it is positive superadded to negative commands. We are told not only what we ought not, but what we ought to do. It has indeed been said that the expression “your communication,” fixes the meaning to apply to the ordinary intercourse of life. But to this there is a fatal objection: the whole prohibition sets out with a reference not to conversational language but to solemn declarations on solemn occasions. “Oaths, Oaths to the Lord,” are placed at the head of the passage; and it is too manifest to be insisted upon that solemn declarations, and not everyday talk, were the subject of the prohibition.

“Whatsoever is more than these, cometh of evil.” This is indeed most accurately true. Evil is the foundation of oaths: it is because men are bad that it is supposed oaths are needed: take away the wickedness of mankind, and we shall still have occasion for no and yes, but we shall need nothing “more than these.” And this consideration furnishes a distinct motive to a good man to decline to swear. To take an oath is tacitly to acknowledge that this "evil" exists in his own mind—that with him Christianity has not effected its destined objects.

From this investigation of the passage, it appears manifest that all swearing upon all occasions is prohibited. Yet the ordinary opinion, or rather perhaps the ordinary defence is, that the passage has no reference to judicial oaths. "We explain our Saviour's words to relate not to judicial oaths but to the practice of vain, wanton, and unauthorized swearing in common discourse." To this we have just seen that there is one conclusive answer: our Saviour distinctly and specifically mentions, as the subject of his instructions, solemn oaths. But there is another conclusive answer even upon our opponents' own showing. They say first, that Christ described particular forms of oaths which might be employed, and next, that his precepts referred to wanton swearing; that is to say, that Christ described what particular forms of wanton swearing he allowed and what he disallowed! You cannot avoid this monstrous conclusion. If Christ spoke only of vain and wanton swearing, and if he described the modes that were lawful, he sanctioned wanton swearing provided we swear in the prescribed form.

With such distinctness of evidence as to the universality of the prohibition of oaths by Jesus Christ, it is not in strictness necessary to refer to those passages in the Christian Scriptures which some persons adduce in favor of their employment. If Christ have prohibited them, nothing else can prove them to be right. Our reference to these passages will accordingly be short.

"I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the son of God." To those who allege that Christ, in answering to this "Thou hast said," took an oath, a sufficient answer has already been intimated. If Christ then took an oath, he swore by the Deity, and this is precisely the very kind of oath which it is acknowledged he himself forbade. But what imaginable reason could there be for examining him upon oath? Who ever heard of calling upon a prisoner to swear that he was guilty? Nothing was wanted but a simple declaration that he was the Son of God. With this view the proceeding was extremely natural. Finding that to the less urgent solicitation he made no reply, the high priest proceeded to the more urgent. Schleusner expressly remarks upon the passage that the words, I adjure, do not here mean, "I make to swear or put upon oath," but "I solemnly and in the name of God exhort and enjoin." This is evidently the natural and the only natural meaning; just as it was the natural meaning when the evil spirit said, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou torment me not." The evil spirit surely did not administer an oath.

"God is my witness that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers."* That the Almighty was witness to the subject of his prayers is most true; but to state this truth is not to swear. Neither this language nor that which is indicated below, contains the characteristics of an oath according to the definitions even of those who urge the expressions. None of them contain according to Milton's definition, "a curse upon ourselves;" nor according to Paley's "an invocation of God's vengeance." Similar language, but in a more emphatic form is employed in writing to the Corinthian converts. It appears from 2 Cor. 11. that Paul had resolved not again to go to Corinth in heaviness, lest he should make them sorry. And to assure them why he had made this resolution he says, "I call God for a record upon my soul that to spare you I came out as yet unto Corinth." In order to show this to be an oath, it will be necessary to show that the apostle imprecated the vengeance of God if he did not speak the truth. Who can show this?—The expression appears to me to be only an emphatical mode of saying, God is witness; or as the expression is sometimes employed in the present day, God knows that such was my endeavor or desire.

* Rom. i. 9. See also 1 Thess. ii. 5. and Gal. i. 20.

The next and the last argument is of a very exceptionable class; it is founded upon silence. "For men verily swear by the greater, and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife."* Respecting this it is said that it "speaks of the custom of swearing judicially without any mark of censure or disapprobation." Will it then be contended that whatever an apostle mentions without reprobating, he approves? The same apostle speaks just in the same manner of the pagan games; of running a race for prizes and of "striving for the mastery." Yet who would admit the argument, that because Paul did not then censure the games, he thought them right! The existing custom both of swearing and of the games, are adduced merely by way of illustration of the writer's subject.

Respecting the lawfulness of oaths, then, as determined by the Christian Scriptures, how does the balance of evidence stand? On the one side, we have plain emphatical prohibitions—prohibitions, of which the distinctness is more fully proved the more they are investigated; on the other we have—counter precepts? No; it is not even pretended; but we have examples of the use of language, of which it is saying much to say, that it is doubtful whether they are oaths or not. How, then, would the man of reason and of philosophy decide?—"Many of the Christian fathers," says Grotius, "condemned all oaths without exception."* Grotius was himself an advocate of oaths. "I say nothing of perjury," says Tertullian, "since swearing itself is unlawful to Christians."† Chrysostom says, "Do not say to me, I swear for a just purpose: it is no longer lawful for thee to swear either justly or unjustly."‡ "He who," says Gregory of Nysse, "has precluded murder by taking away anger, and who has taken away the pollution of adultery by subduing desire, has expelled from our life the curse of perjury by forbidding us to swear; for where there is no oath, there can be no infringement of it."§ Such is the conviction which the language of Christ conveyed to the early converts to his pure religion; and such is the conviction which I think it would convey to us if custom had not familiarized us with the evil, and if we did not read the New Testament rather to find justifications of our practice than to discover the truth and to apply it to our conduct.

* Heb. vi. 16.

EFFICACY OF OATHS AS SECURITIES FOR VERACITY.

Men naturally speak the truth unless they have some inducements to falsehood. When they have such inducements what is it that overcomes them and still prompts them to speak the truth?

Considerations of duty, founded upon religion:

The apprehension of the ill opinion of other men:

The fear of legal penalties.

I. It is obvious that the intervention of an oath is designed to strengthen only the first of these motives—that is, the religious sanction. I say to strengthen the religious sanction. No one supposes it creates that sanction; because people know that the sanction is felt to apply to falsehood as well as to perjury. The advant-

* Rights of War and Peace.

† De Idol. cap. II.

‡ In Gen. ii. Hom. xv.

§ In Cant. Home. 13.

age of an oath, then, if advantage there be, is in the increased power which it gives to sentiments of duty founded upon religion. Now, it will be our endeavor to show that this increased power is small; that, in fact, the oath, as such, adds very little to the motives to veracity. What class of men will the reader select in order to illustrate its greatest power?

Good men? They will speak the truth whether without an oath or with it. They know that God has appended to falsehood as to perjury the threat of his displeasure and of punishment in futurity. Upon them religion possesses its rightful influence without the intervention of an oath.

Bad men? Men who care nothing for religion? They will care nothing for it though they take an oath.

Men of ambiguous character? Men on whom the sanctions of religion are sometimes operative and sometimes not? Perhaps it will be said that to these the solemnity of an oath is necessary to rouse their latent apprehensions, and to bind them to veracity. But these persons do not go before a legal officer or into a court of justice as they go into a parlor or meet an acquaintance in the street. Recollection of mind is forced upon them by the circumstances of their situation. The court and the forms of law, and the audience, and the after publicity of the evidence, fix the attention even of the careless. The man of only occasional seriousness, is serious then; and if in their hours of seriousness, such persons regard the sanctions of religion, they will regard them in a court of justice though without an oath.

Yet it may be supposed by the reader that the solemnity of a specific imprecation of the Divine vengeance would, nevertheless, frequently add stronger motives to adhere to truth. But what is the evidence of experience? After testimony has been given on affirmation, the parties are sometimes examined on the same subject upon oath. Now Pothier says, "In forty years of practice, I have only met two instances where the parties, in the case of an oath offered after evidence have been prevented by a sense of religion from persisting in their testimonies." Two instances in forty years; and even with respect to these it is to be remembered, that one great reason why simple affirmations do not bind men is, that their obligation is artificially diminished (as we shall presently see) by the employment of oaths. To the evidence resulting from these truths I know of but one liminary consideration; and to this the reader must attach such weight as he thinks it deserves—that a man on whom an oath had been originally imposed might then have been bound to veracity, who would not incur the shame of having lied by refusing afterwards to confirm his falsehoods with an oath.

II. The next inducement to adhere to truth is the apprehension of the ill opinion of others. And this inducement, either in its direct or indirect operation, will be found to be incomparably more powerful than that religious inducement which is applied by an oath as such. Not so much because religious sanctions are less operative than public opinion, as because public opinion applies or detaches the religious sanction. Upon this subject a serious mistake has been made; for it has been contended that the influence of religious motives is comparatively nothing—that unless men are impelled to speak the truth by fear of disgrace or of legal penalties, they care very little for the sanctions of religion. But the truth is, that the sanctions of religion are, in a great degree, either brought into operation, or prevented from operating, by these secondary motives. Religious sanctions necessarily follow the judgments of the mind; if a man by any means becomes convinced that a given action is wrong, the religious obligation to refrain from it follows. Now, the judgments of men respecting right and wrong are very powerfully affected by public opinion. It commonly happens that that which a man has been habitually taught to think wrong, he does think wrong. Men are thus taught by public opinion. So that if the public attach disgrace to any species of mendacity or perjury, the religious sanction will commonly apply to that species. If there are instances of mendacity or perjury to which public disapprobation does not attach—to those instances the religious sanction will commonly not apply, or apply but weakly. The power of public opinion in binding to veracity is therefore twofold. It has its direct influence arising from the fear which all men feel of the disapprobation of others, and the indirect influence arising from the fact that public opinion applies the sanctions of religion.

III. Of the influence of legal penalties in binding to veracity, little needs to be said. It is obvious that if they induce men to refrain from theft and violence, they will induce men to refrain from perjury. But it may be remarked, that the legal penalty tends to give vigor and efficiency to public opinion. He whom the law punishes as a criminal, is generally regarded as a criminal by the world.

Now that which we affirm is this—that unless public opinion or legal penalties enforce veracity, very little will be added by an oath to the motives to veracity more than would subsist in the case of simple affirmation. The observance of the Oxford statutes is promised by the members on oath—yet no one observes them. They swear to observe them, they imprecate the Divine vengeance if they do not observe them, and yet they disregard them every day. The oath then is of no avail. An oath, as such, does not here bind men's consciences. And why? Because those sanctions by which men's consciences are bound, are not applied. The law applies none: public opinion applies none: and therefore the religious sanction is weak; too weak with most men to avail. Not that no motives founded upon religion present themselves to the mind; for I doubt not there are good men who would refuse to take these oaths simply in consequence of religious motives: but constant experience shows that these men are comparatively few; and if any one should say that upon them an oath is influential, we answer, that they are precisely the very persons who would be bound by their simple promises without an oath.

The oaths of jurymen afford another instance. Jurymen swear that they will give a verdict according to the evidence, and yet it is perfectly well known that they often assent to a verdict which they believe to be contrary to that evidence. They do not all coincide in the verdict which the foreman pronounces, it is indeed often impossible that they should coincide. This perjury is committed by multitudes; yet what jurymen cares for it, or refuses, in consequence of his oath, to deliver a verdict which he believes to be improper? The reason that they do not care is, that the oath, as such, does not bind their consciences. It stands alone. The public do not often reprobate the violation of such oaths; the law does not punish it; jurymen learn to think that it is no harm to violate them; and the resulting conclusion is, that the form of an oath cannot and does not supply the deficiency;—It cannot and does not apply the religious sanction.

Step a few yards from the jury-box to the witness-box, and you see the difference. There public opinion interposes its power—there the punishment of perjury impends—there the religious sanction is applied—and there, consequently, men regard the truth. If the simple intervention of an oath was that which bound men to veracity, they would be bound in the jury-box as much as at ten feet off ; but it is not.

A custom-house oath is nugatory even to a proverb. Yet it is an oath : yet the swearer does stake his salvation upon his veracity ; and still his veracity is not secured. Why? Because an oath, as such, applies to the minds of most men little or no motive to veracity. They do not in fact think that their salvation is staked, necessarily, by oaths. They think it is either staked or not, according to certain other circumstances quite independent of the oath itself. These circumstances are not associated with custom-house oaths, and therefore they do not avail.

We return then to our proposition—Unless public opinion or legal penalties enforce veracity, very little is added by an oath to the motives to veracity, more than would subsist in the case of simple affirmation.

It is obvious that the legislature might, if it pleased, attach the same penalties to falsehood as it now attaches to perjury ; and therefore all the motives to veracity which are furnished by the law in the case of oaths, might be equally furnished in the case of affirmation. This is in fact done by the legislature in the case of the Society of Friends.

It is also obvious that public opinion might be applied to affirmation much more powerfully than it is now. The simple circumstance of disusing oaths would effect this. Even now, when the public disapprobation is excited against a man who has given false evidence in a court of justice, by what is it excited? by his having broken his oath, or by his having given false testimony? It is the falsehood which excites the disapprobation, much more than the circumstance that the falsehood was in spite of an oath. This public disapprobation is founded upon the general perception of the guilt of false testimony and of its perniciousness. Now if affirmation only was employed, this public disapprobation would follow the lying witness, as it now follows, or nearly as it now follows, the perjured witness. Every thing but the mere oath would be the same—the fear of penalties, the fear of disgrace, the motives of religion would remain; and we have just shown how little a mere oath avails. But we have artificially diminished the public reprobation of lying by establishing oaths. The tendency of instituting oaths is manifestly to diffuse the sentiment that there is a difference in the degree of obligation not to lie, and not to swear falsely. This difference is made, not so much by adding stronger motives to veracity by an oath, as by deducting from the motives to veracity in simple affirmations. Let the public opinion take its own healthful and unobstructed course, and falsehood in evidence will quickly be regarded as a flagrant offence. Take away oaths, and the public reprobation of falsehood will immediately increase in power, and will bring with its increase an increasing efficiency in the religious sanction. The present relative estimate of lying and perjury is a very inaccurate standard by which to judge of the efficiency of oaths. We have artificially reduced the abhorrence of lying, and then say that that abhorrence is not great enough to bind men to the truth.

Our reasoning then proceeds by these steps. Oaths are designed to apply a strong religious sanction: they however do not apply it unless they are seconded by the apprehension of penalties or disgrace. The apprehension of penalties and disgrace may be attached to falsehood, and with this apprehension the religious sanction will also be attached to it. Therefore, all those motives which bind men to veracity may be applied to falsehood as well as to oaths.—In other words, oaths are needless.

But in reality we have evidence of this needlessness from every day experience. In some of the most important of temporal affairs, an oath is never used. The Houses of Parliament in their examinations of witnesses employ no oaths. They are convinced (and therefore they have proved) that the truth can be discovered without them. But if affirmation is thus a sufficient security for veracity in the great questions of a legislature, how can it be insufficient in the little questions of private life? There is a strange inconsistency here. That same Parliament which declares, by its every-day practice, that oaths are needless, continues, by its every-day practice, to impose them! Even more: those very men who themselves take oaths as a necessary qualification for their duties as legislators, proceed to the exercise of these duties upon the mere testimony of other men!—Peers are never required to take oaths in delivering their testimony, yet no one thinks that a peer's evidence in a court of justice may not be as much depended upon as that of him who swears. Why are peers in fact bound to veracity though without an oath? Will you say that the religious sanction is more powerful upon lords than upon other men? The supposition were ridiculous. How then does it happen? You reply, Their honor binds them: Very well; that is the same as to say that public opinion binds them. But then, he who says that honor, or anything else besides pure religious sanctions, binds men to veracity, impugns the very grounds upon which oaths are defended.

Oath evidence again is not required by courts-martial. But can any man assign a reason why a person who would speak the truth on affirmation before military officers, would not speak it on affirmation before a judge? Arbitrations too proceed often, perhaps generally, upon evidence of parole. Yet do not arbitrators discover the truth as well as courts of justice?

and if they did not, it would be little in favor of oaths, because a part of the sanction of veracity is, in the case of arbitration, withdrawn.

But we have even tried the experiment of affirmations in our own courts of justice, and tried it for some ages past. The Society of Friends uniformly give their evidence in courts of law on their words alone. No man imagines that their words do not bind them. No legal court would listen with more suspicion to a witness because he was a Quaker. Here all the motives to veracity are applied: there is the religious motive, which in such cases all but desperately bad men feel: there is the motive of public opinion: and there is the motive arising from the penalties of the law. If the same motives were applied to other men, why should they not be as effectual in securing veracity as they are upon the Quakers?

We have an example even yet more extensive. In all the courts of the United States of America, no one is obliged to take an oath. What are we to conclude? Are the Americans so foolish a people that they persist in accepting affirmations knowing that they do not bind witnesses to truth? Or, do the Americans really find that affirmations are sufficient? But one answer can be given:—They find that affirmations are sufficient: they prove undeniably that oaths are needless. No one will imagine that virtue on the other side the Atlantic is so much greater than on this, that while an affirmation is sufficient for an American an oath is necessary here.

So that whether we enquire into the moral lawfulness of oaths, they are not lawful; or into their practical utility, they are of little use or of none.

EFFECTS OF OATHS.

THERE is a power and efficacy in our religion which elevates those who heartily accept it above that low moral state in which alone an oath can even be supposed to be of advantage. The man who takes an oath, virtually declares that his word would not bind him; and this is an admission which no good man should make—for the sake both of his own moral character and of the credit of religion itself. It is the testimony even of infidelity, that “wherever men of uncommon energy and dignity of mind have existed, they have felt the degradation of binding their assertions with an oath.”* This degradation, this descent from the proper ground on which a man of integrity should stand, illustrates the proposition that whatever exceeds affirmation “cometh of evil.” The evil origin is so palpable that you cannot comply with the custom without feeling that you sacrifice the dignity of virtue. It is related of Solon that he said, “A good man ought to be in that estimation that he needs not an oath; because it is to be reputed a lessening of his honor if he be forced to swear.”† If to take an oath lessened a pagan’s honor, what must be its effect upon a Christian’s purity.

Oaths, at least the system of oaths which obtains in this country, tends powerfully to deprave the moral character. We have seen that they are continually violated—that men are continually referring to the most tremendous sanctions of religion with the habitual belief that those sanctions impose no practical obligation. Can this have any other tendency than to diminish the influence of religious sanctions upon other things? If a man sets light by the Divine vengeance in the jury-box to-day, is he likely to give full weight to that vengeance before a magistrate to-morrow? We cannot prevent the effects of habit. Such things will infallibly deteriorate the moral character, because they infallibly diminish the power of those principles upon which the moral character is founded.

* Godwin: Political Justice, vol. 2. p. 633. † Stobæus: Serm. 3.

Oaths encourage falsehood. We have already seen that the effect of instituting oaths is to diminish the practical obligation of simple affirmation. The law says, You must speak the truth when you are upon your oath ; which is the same thing as to say that it is less harm to violate truth when you are not on your oath. The court sometimes reminds a witness that he is upon oath, which is equivalent to saying, If you were not, we should think less of your mendacity. The same lesson is inculcated by the assignation of penalties to perjury and not to falsehood. What is a man to conclude, but that the law thinks light of the crime which it does not punish ; and that since he may lie with impunity, it is not much harm to lie? Common language bears testimony to the effect. The vulgar phrase, I will take my oath to it, clearly evinces the prevalent notion that a man may lie with less guilt when he does not take his oath. No answer can be made to this remark, unless any one can show that the extra sanction of an oath is so much added to the obligation which would otherwise attach to simple affirmation. And who can show this? Experience proves the contrary : “ Experience bears ample testimony to the fact, that the prevalence of oaths among men (Christians not excepted) has produced a very material and a very general effect in reducing their estimate of the obligation of plain truth, in its natural and simple forms.”*—“ There is no cause of insincerity, prevarication, and falsehood, more powerful than the practice of administering oaths in a court of justice.” †

Upon this subject the legislator plays a desperate game against the morality of a people. He wishes to make them speak the truth when they undertake an office or deliver evidence. Even supposing him to succeed, what is the cost? That of diminishing the motives to veracity in all the affairs of life. A man may not be called upon to take an oath above two or three times in his life, but he is called upon to speak the truth every day.

* Gurney : Observations, &c. c. X. † Godwin : v. 2. p. 634.

A few, but a few serious, words remain. The investigations of this chapter are not matters to employ speculation but to influence our practice. If it be indeed true that Jesus Christ has imperatively forbidden us to employ an oath, a duty, an imperative duty is imposed upon us. It is worse than merely vain to hear his laws unless we obey them. Of him therefore who is assured of the prohibition, it is indispensably required that he should refuse an oath. There is no other means of maintaining our allegiance to God. Our pretensions to Christianity are at stake: for he who, knowing the Christian law, will not conform to it, is certainly not a Christian. How then does it happen, that although persons frequently acknowledge they think oaths are forbidden, so few, when they are called upon to swear, decline to do it? Alas, this offers one evidence amongst the many, of the want of uncompromising moral principles in the world—of such principles as it has been the endeavor of these pages to enforce—of such principles as would prompt us and enable us to sacrifice every thing to Christian fidelity. By what means do the persons of whom we speak suppose that the will of God respecting oaths is to be effected? To whose practice do they look for an exemplification of the Christian standard? Do they await some miracle by which the whole world shall be convinced, and oaths shall be abolished without the agency of man? Such are not the means by which it is the pleasure of the Universal Lord to act. He effects his moral purposes by the instrumentality of faithful men. Where are these faithful men?—But let it be : if those who are called to this fidelity refuse, theirs will be the dishonor and the offence. But the work will eventually be done. Other and better men will assuredly arise to acquire the Christian honor and to receive the Christian reward.

---

CHAPTER VIII.

IMMORAL AGENCY.

Publication and circulation of books — Seneca — Circulating Libraries—Prosecutions—Political affairs.

A GREAT portion of the moral evil in the world, is the result not so much of the intensity of individual wickedness, as of a general incompleteness in the practical virtue of all classes of men. If it were possible to take away misconduct from one half of the community and to add its amount to the remainder, it is probable that the moral character of our species would be soon benefited by the change. Now, the ill dispositions of the bad are powerfully encouraged by the want of upright examples in those who are better. A man may deviate considerably from rectitude, and still be as good as his neighbors. From such a man, the motive to excellence which the constant presence of virtuous example supplies, is taken away. So that there is reason to believe, that if the bad were to become worse, and the reputable to become proportionably better, the average virtue of the world would speedily be increased.

One of the modes by which the efficacy of example in reputable persons is miserably diminished, is by what we have called immoral agency—by their being willing to encourage, at second hand, evils which they would not commit as principals. Linked together as men are in society, it is frequently difficult to perform an unwarrantable action without some sort of co-operation from creditable men. This co-operation is not often, except in flagrant cases, refused; and thus not only is the commission of such actions facilitated, but a general relaxation is induced in the practical estimates which men form of the standard of rectitude.

Since, then, so much evil attends this agency in unwarrantable conduct, it manifestly becomes a good man to look around upon the nature of his intercourse with others, and to consider whether he is not virtually promoting evils which his judgment deprecates, or reducing the standard of moral judgment in the world. The reader would have no difficulty in perceiving that, if a strenuous opponent of the slave trade should establish a manufactory of manacles, and thumbscrews, and iron collars for the slave merchants, he would be grossly inconsistent with himself. The reader would perceive too, that his labors in the cause of the abolition would be almost nullified by the viciousness of his example, and that he would generally discredit pretensions to philanthropy. Now, that which we desire the reader to do is, to apply the principles which this illustration exhibits to other and less flagrant cases. Other cases of co-operation with evil may be less flagrant than this; but they are not, on that account, innocent. I have read, in the life of a man of great purity of character, that he refused to draw up a will or some such document because it contained a transfer of some slaves. He thought that slavery was absolutely wrong; and therefore would not, even by the remotest implication, sanction the system by his example.* I think he exercised a sound Christian judgment, and if all who prepare such documents acted upon the same principles, I know not whether they would not so influence public opinion as greatly to hasten the abolition of slavery itself. Yet where is the man who would refuse to do this, or to do things even less defensible than this?

* One of the publications of this excellent man contains a paragraph much to our present purpose: "In all our concerns, it is necessary that nothing we do may carry the appearance of

PUBLICATION AND CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.—It is a very common thing to hear of the evils of pernicious reading, of how it enervates the mind, or how it depraves the principles. The complaints are doubtless just. These books could not be read, and these evils would be spared the world, if one did not write, and another did not print, and another did not sell, and another did not circulate them. Are those then, without whose agency the mischief could not ensue, to be held innocent in affording this agency! Yet, loudly as we complain of the evil, and carefully as we warn our children to avoid it, how seldom do we hear public reprobation of the writers! As to printers, and booksellers, and library keepers, we scarcely hear their offences mentioned at all. We speak not of those abandoned publications which all respectable men condemn, but of those which, pernicious as they are confessed to be, furnish reading-rooms and libraries, and are habitually sold in almost every bookseller's shop. Seneca says, "He that lends a man money to carry him to a bawdy-house, or a weapon for his revenge, makes himself a partner of his crime." He, too, who writes or sells a book which will, in all probability, injure the reader, is accessory to the mischief which may be done ; with this aggravation, when compared with the examples of Seneca, that whilst the money would probably do mischief but to one or two persons, the book may injure a hundred or a thousand. Of the writers of injurious books, we need say no more. If the inferior agents are censurable, the primary agent must be more censurable. A printer or a bookseller should, however, reflect, that to be not so bad as another, is a very different thing from being innocent. When we see that the owner of a press will print any work that is offered to him, with no other concern about its tendency than whether it will subject him to penalties from the law, we surely must perceive that he exercises but a very imperfect virtue. Is it obligatory upon us not to promote ill principles in other men? He does not fulfil the obligation. Is it obligatory upon us to promote rectitude by unimpeachable example? He does not exhibit that example. If it were right for my neighbor to furnish me with the means of moral injury, it would not be wrong for me to accept and to employ them.

approbation of the works of wickedness, make the unrighteous more at ease in unrighteousness, or occasion the injuries committed against the oppressed to be more lightly looked over."—Considerations on the True Harmony of Mankind, c 3, by John Woolman.

I stand in a bookseller's shop, and observe his customers successively coming in. One orders a lexicon, and one a work of scurrilous infidelity ; one Captain Cook's Voyages, and one a new licentious romance. If the bookseller takes and executes all these orders with the same willingness, I cannot but perceive that there is an inconsistency, an incompleteness, in his moral principles of action. Perhaps this person is so conscious of the mischievous effects of such books, that he would not allow them in the hands of his children, nor suffer them to be seen on his parlor table. But if he thus knows the evils which they inflict, can it be right for him to be the agent in diffusing them? Such a person does not exhibit that consistency, that completeness of virtuous conduct, without which the Christian character cannot be fully exhibited. Step into the shop of this bookseller's neighbor, a druggist, and there, if a person asks for some arsenic, the tradesman begins to be anxious. He considers whether it is probable the buyer wants it for a proper purpose. If he does sell it, he cautions the buyer to keep it where others cannot have access to it ; and, before he delivers the packet, legibly inscribes upon it poison. One of these men sells poison to the body, and the other poison to the mind. If the anxiety and caution of the druggist is right, the indifference of the bookseller must be wrong. Add to which, that the druggist would not sell arsenic at all if it were not sometimes useful ; but to what readers can a vicious book be useful ?

Suppose for a moment that no printer would commit such a book to his press, and that no bookseller would sell it, the consequence would be, that nine-tenths of these manuscripts would be thrown into the fire, or rather, that they would never have been written. The inference is obvious ; and surely it is not needful again to enforce the consideration, that although your refusal might not prevent vicious books from being published, you are not therefore exempted from the obligation to refuse. A man must do his duty whether the effects of his fidelity be such as he would desire or not. Such purity of conduct might, no doubt, circumscribe a man's business, and so does purity of conduct in some other professions ; but if this be a sufficient excuse for contributing to demoralize the world, if profit be a justification of a departure from rectitude, it will be easy to defend the business of a pickpocket.

I know that the principles of conduct which these paragraphs recommend, lead to grave practical consequences : I know that they lead to the conclusion that the business of a printer or bookseller, as it is ordinarily conducted, is not consistent with Christian uprightness. A man may carry on a business in select works; and this, by some conscientious persons, is really done. In the present state of the press, the difficulty of obtaining a considerable business as a bookseller without circulating injurious works may frequently be great, and it is in consequence of this difficulty that we see so few booksellers amongst the Quakers. The few who do conduct the business generally reside in large towns, where the demand for all books is so great that a person can procure a competent income though he excludes the bad.

He who is more studious to justify his conduct than to act aright may say, that if a person may sell no book that can injure another, he can scarcely sell any book. The answer is, that although there must be some difficulty in discrimination, though a bookseller cannot always inform himself what the precise tendency of a book is—yet there can be no difficulty in judging respecting numberless books, that their tendency is bad. If we cannot define the precise distinction between the good and the evil, we can, nevertheless, perceive the evil when it has attained to a certain extent. He who cannot distinguish day from evening can distinguish it from night.

The case of the proprietors of common circulating libraries is yet more palpable; because the majority of the books which they contain inflict injury upon their readers. How it happens that persons of respectable character, and who join with others in lamenting the frivolity, and worse than frivolity, of the age, nevertheless daily and hourly contribute to the mischief, without any apparent consciousness of inconsistency, it is difficult to explain. A person establishes, perhaps, one of these libraries for the first time in a country town. He supplies the younger and less busy part of its inhabitants with a source of moral injury from which hitherto they had been exempt. The girl who, till now, possessed sober views of life, he teaches to dream of the extravagances of love ; he familiarizes her ideas with intrigue and licentiousness ; destroys her disposition for rational pursuits ; and prepares her, it may be, for a victim of debauchery. These evils, or such as these, he inflicts, not upon one or two, but upon as many as he can ; and yet this person lays his head upon his pillow, as if, in all this, he was not offending against virtue or against man !

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.—The amount of immoral agency which is practised in these affairs, is very great. Look to any of the continental governments, or to any that have subsisted there, how few acts of misrule, of oppression, of injustice, and of crime, have been prevented by the want of agents of the iniquity ! I speak not of notoriously bad men : of these, bad governors can usually find enough : but I speak of men who pretend to respectability and virtue of character, and who are actually called respectable by the world. There is perhaps no class of affairs in which the agency of others is more indispensable to the accomplishment of a vicious act, than in the political. Very little—comparatively very little—of oppression and of the political vices of rulers should we see, if reputable men did not lend their agency. These evils could not be committed through the agency of merely bad men ; because the very fact that bad men only would abet them, would frequently preclude the possibility of their commission. It is not to be pretended that no public men possess or have possessed sufficient virtue to refuse to be the agents of a vicious government—but they are few. If they were numerous, especially if they were as numerous as they ought to be, history, even very modern history, would have had a far other record to frame than that which now devolves to her. Can it be needful to argue upon such things? Can it be needful to prove that, neither the commands of ministers, nor "systems of policy," nor any other circumstance, exempts a public man from the obligations of the moral law? Public men often act as if they thought that to be a public man was to be brought under the jurisdiction of a new and a relaxed morality. They often act as if they thought that not to be the prime mover in political misdeeds, was to be exempt from all moral responsibility for those deeds. A dagger, if it could think, would think it was not responsible for the assassination of which it was the agent. A public man may be a political dagger, but he cannot, like the dagger, be irresponsible.

These illustrations of immoral agency and of the obligation to avoid it might be multiplied, if enough had not been offered to make our sentiments, and the reasons upon which they are founded, obvious to the reader. Undoubtedly, in the present state of society, it is no easy task, upon these subjects, to wash our hands in innocency. But if we cannot avoid all agency, direct or indirect, in evil things, we can avoid much: and it will be sufficiently early to complain of the difficulty of complete purity, when we have dismissed from our conduct as much impurity as we can.

---

CHAPTER IX.

THE INFLUENCE OF INDIVIDUALS UPON PUBLIC NOTIONS OF MORALITY.

Public notions of morality—Errors of public opinion: their effects—Duelling—Glory—Military virtues—Military talent—Bravery—Courage—Patriotism not the soldier's motive—Military fame—Public opinion of unchastity: In women: In men—Power of character—Character in Legal men—Fame—Faults of great men—The Press—Newspapers—History: Its defects: Its power.

THAT the influence of public opinion upon the practice of virtue is very great, needs no proof. Of this influence the reader has seen some remarkable illustrations in the discussion of the efficacy of oaths in binding to veracity.* There is, indeed, almost no action and no institution which public opinion does not affect. In moral affairs it makes men call one mode of human destruction murderous and one honorable; it makes the same action abominable in one individual and venial in another: in public institutions, from a village workhouse to the constitution of a state, it is powerful alike for evil or for good. If it be misdirected, it will strengthen and perpetuate corruption and abuse; if it be directed aright, it will eventually remove corruptions and correct abuses with a power which no power can withstand.

In proportion to the greatness of its power is the necessity of rectifying public opinion itself. To contribute to its rectitude is to exercise exalted philanthropy—to contribute to its incorrectness is to spread wickedness and misery in the world. The purpose of the present chapter is to remark upon some of those subjects on which the public opinion appears to be inaccurate, and upon the consequent obligation upon individuals not to perpetuate that inaccuracy and its attendant evils by their conduct or their language. Of the positive part of the obligation—that which respects the active correction of common opinions little will be said. He who does not promote the evil can scarcely fail of promoting the good. A man often must deliver his sentiments respecting the principles and actions of others, and if he delivers them, so as not to encourage what is wrong, he will practically encourage what is right.

* Essay 2, chap. 7.

It might have been presumed of a people who assent to the authority of the moral law, that their notions of the merit or turpitude of actions would have been conformable with the doctrines which that law delivers. Far other is the fact. The estimates of the moral law and of public opinion are discordant to excess. Men have practiced a sort of transposition with the moral precepts, and have assigned to them arbitrary and capricious, and therefore new and mischievous, stations on the moral scale. The order both of the vices and the virtues is greatly deranged.

How, it may reasonably be asked, do these strange incongruities arise? First, men practise a sort of voluntary deception on themselves; they persuade themselves to think that an offence which they desire to commit, is not so vicious as the moral law indicates, or as others to which they have little temptation. They persuade themselves again, that a virtue which is easily practised, is of great worth, because they thus flatter themselves with complacent notions of their excellences at a cheap rate. Virtues which are difficult they, for the same reason, depreciate. This is the dictate of interest. It is manifestly good policy to think lightly of the value of a quality which we do not choose to be at the cost of possessing; and who would willingly think there was much evil in a vice which he practised every day?—That which a man thus persuades himself to think a trivial vice or an unimportant virtue, he of course speaks of as such amongst his neighbors. They perhaps are as much interested in propagating the delusion as he: they listen with willing ears, and cherish and proclaim the grateful falsehood. By these and by other means the public notions become influenced; a long continuance of the general chicanery at length actually confounds the public opinion; and when once an opinion has become a public opinion, there is no difficulty in accounting for the perpetuation of the fallacy.

If sometimes the mind of an individual recurs to the purer standard, a multitude of obstacles present themselves to its practical adoption. He hopes that under the present circumstances of society an exact obedience to the moral law is not required; he tries to think that the notions of a kingdom or a continent cannot be so erroneous; and at any rate trusts that as he deviates with millions, millions will hardly be held guilty at the bar of God. The misdirection of public opinion is an obstacle to the virtue even of good men. He who looks beyond the notions of others, and founds his moral principles upon the moral law, yet feels that it is more difficult to conform to that law when he is discountenanced by the general notions than if those notions supported and encouraged him. What then must the effect of such misdirection be upon those to whom acceptance in the world is the principal concern, and who, if others applaud or smile, seem to be indifferent whether their own hearts condemn them?

Now, with a participation in the evils which the misdirection of public opinion occasions, every one is chargeable who speaks of moral actions according to a standard that varies from that which Christianity has exhibited. Here is the cause of the evil, and here must be its remedy. "It is an important maxim in morals as well as in education to call things by their right names.”* “To bestow good names on bad things, is to give them a passport in the world under a delusive disguise.”† “The soft names and plausible colors under which deceit, sensuality, and revenge are presented to us in common discourse, weaken by degrees our natural sense of the distinction between good and evil.”‡ Public notions of morality constitute a sort of line of demarcation, which is regarded by most men in their practice as a boundary between right and wrong. He who contributes to fix this boundary in the wrong place, who places evil on the side of virtue, or goodness on the side of vice, offends more deeply against the morality and the welfare of the world, than multitudes who are punished by the arm of law. If moral offences are to be estimated by their consequences, few will be found so deep as that of habitually giving good names to bad things. It is well indeed for the responsibility of individuals that their contribution to the aggregate mischief is commonly small. Yet every man should remember that it is by the contribution of individuals that the aggregate is formed; and that it can only be by the deductions of individuals that it will be done away.

DUELLING.—If two boys who disagreed about a game of marbles or a penny tart, should therefore walk out by the river side, quietly take off their clothes, and when they had got into the water, each try to keep the other’s head down until one of them was drowned, we should doubtless think that these two boys were mad. If, when the survivor returned to his schoolfellows, they patted him on the shoulder, told him he was a spirited fellow, and that, if he had not tried the feat in the water, they would never have played at marbles or any other game with him again, we should doubtless think that these boys were infected with a most revolting and disgusting depravity and ferociousness. We should instantly exert ourselves to correct their principles, should feel assured that nothing could ever induce us to tolerate, much less to encourage such abandoned depravity. And yet we do both tolerate and encourage such depravity every day. Change the penny tart for some other trifle; instead of boys put men, and instead of a river, a pistol—and we encourage it all. We virtually pat the survivor's shoulder, tell him he is a man of honor, and that, if he had not shot at his acquaintance, we would never have dined with him again. "Revolting and disgusting depravity" are at once excluded from our vocabulary. We substitute such phrases as "the course which a gentleman is obliged to pursue"—"it was necessary to his honor"—"one could not have associated with him if he had not fought."—We are the schoolboys, grown up; and by the absurdity, and more than absurdity of our phrases and actions, shooting or drowning (it matters not which) becomes the practice of the national school.

* Rees’s Encyclop. Art. Philos. Moral.

† Knox’s Essays, No. 34.

‡ Blair, Serm. 9.

It is not a trifling question that a man puts to himself when he asks, What is the amount of my contribution to this detestable practice? It is by individual contributions to the public notions respecting it that the practice is kept up. Men do not fire at one another because they are fond of risking their own lives or other men's, but because public notions are such as they are. Nor do I think any deduction can be more manifestly just, than that he who contributes to the misdirection of these notions is responsible for a share of the evil and the guilt. When some offence has given probability to a duel, every man acts immorally who evinces any disposition to coolness with either party until he has resolved to fight; and if eventually one of them falls, he is a party to his destruction. Every word of unfriendliness, every look of indifference, is positive guilt; for it is such words and such looks that drive men to their pistols. It is the same after a victim has fallen. "I pity his family, but they have the consolation of knowing that he vindicated his honor," is equivalent to urging another and another to fight. Every heedless gossip who asks, "Have you heard of this affair of honor?" and every reporter of news who relates it as a proper and necessary procedure, participates in the general crime.

If they who hear of an intended meeting amongst their friends hasten to manifest that they will continue their intercourse with the parties though they do not fight—if none talks of vindicating honor by demanding satisfaction—if he who speaks and he who writes of this atrocity, speaks and writes as reason and morals dictate, duelling will soon disappear from the world. To contribute to the suppression of the custom is therefore easy, and let no man, and let no woman, who does not, as occasion offers, express reprobation of the custom, think that their hands are clear of blood. They especially are responsible for its continuance whose station or general character gives peculiar influence to their opinions in its favor.

GLORY: MILITARY VIRTUES.—To prove that war is an evil were much the same as to prove that the light of the sun is a good. And yet, though no one will dispute the truth, there are few who consider, and few who know how great the evil is. The practice is encircled with so many glittering fictions, that most men are content with but a vague and inadequate idea of the calamities, moral, physical, and political, which it inflicts upon our species. But if few men consider how prodigious its mischiefs are they see enough to agree in the conclusion, that the less frequently it happens the better for the common interests of man. Supposing then that some wars are lawful and unavoidable, it is nevertheless manifest, that whatever tends to make them more frequent than necessity requires, must be very pernicious to mankind. Now, in consequence of a misdirection of public notions, this needless frequency exists. Public opinion is favorable, not so much to war in the abstract or in practice, as to the profession of arms; and the inevitable consequence is this, that war itself is greatly promoted without reference to the causes for which it may be undertaken. By attaching notions of honor to the military profession, and of glory to military achievements, three wars probably have been occasioned where there otherwise would have been but one. To talk of the "splendors of conquest," and the "glories of victory," to extol those who "fall covered with honor in their country's cause," is to occasion the recurrence of wars, not because they are necessary, but because they are desired. It is in fact contributing, according to the speaker's power, to desolate provinces and set villages in flames, to ruin thousands and destroy thousands—to inflict, in brief, all the evils and the miseries which war inflicts. "Splendors,"—"Glories,"—"Honors!"—the listening soldier wants to signalize himself like the heroes who are departed; he wants to thrust his sickle into the fields of fame and reap undying laurels:—How shall he signalize himself without a war, and on what field can he reap glory but in the field of battle? The consequence is inevitable: Multitudes desire war;—they are fond of war—and it requires no sagacity to discover, that to desire and to love it is to make it likely to happen. Thus a perpetual motive to human destruction is created, of which the tendency is as inevitable as the tendency of a stone to fall to the earth. The present state of public opinion manifestly promotes the recurrence of wars of all kinds, necessary (if such there are) and unnecessary. It promotes wars of pure aggression, of the most unmingled wickedness; it promoted the wars of the departed Louises and Napoleons. It awards "glory" to the soldier wherever be his achievements and in whatever cause.

Now, waiving the after consideration as to the nature of glory itself, the individual may judge of his duties with respect to public opinion by its effects. To minister to the popular notions of glory is to encourage needless wars; it is therefore his duty not to minister to these notions. Common talk by a man's fireside contributes its little to the universal evil, and shares in the universal offence. Of the writers of some books it is not too much to suppose, that they have occasioned more murders than all the clubs and pistols of assassins for ages have effected. Is there no responsibility for this?

But perhaps it will afford to some men new ideas if we enquire what the real nature of the military virtues is. They receive more of applause than virtues of any other kind. How does this happen? We must seek a solution in the seeming paradox, that their pretensions to the characters of virtues are few and small. They receive much applause because they merit little. They could not subsist without it; and if men resolve to practice war, and consequently to require the conduct which gives success to war, they must decorate that conduct with glittering fictions, and extol the military virtues though they be neither good nor great. Of every species of real excellence it is the general characteristic that it is not anxious for applause. The more elevated the virtue the less the desire, and the less is the public voice a motive to action. What should we say of that man's benevolence who would not relieve a neighbor in distress unless the donation would be praised in a newspaper? What should we say of that man's piety who prayed only when he was "seen of men?" But the military virtues live upon applause; it is their vital element and their food, their great pervading motive and reward. Are there, then, amongst the respective virtues such discordances of character—such total contrariety of nature and essence? No, no. But how, then, do you account for the fact, that whilst all other great virtues are independent of the public praise and stand aloof from it, the military virtues can scarcely exist without it?

It is again a characteristic of exalted virtue, that it tends to produce exalted virtues of other kinds. He that is distinguished by diffusive benevolence, is rarely chargeable with profaneness or debauchery. The man of piety is not seen drunk. The man of candor and humility is not vindictive or unchaste. Can the same thing be predicated of the tendency of military virtues? Do they tend powerfully to the production of all other virtues? Is the brave man peculiarly pious? Is the military patriot peculiarly chaste? Is he who pants for glory and acquires it, distinguished by unusual placability and temperance? No, no. How then do you account for the fact, that whilst other virtues thus strongly tend to produce and to foster one another,* the military virtues have little of such tendency, or none?

The simple truth, however veiled and however unwelcome, is this, that the military virtues will not endure examination. They are called what they are not, or what they are in a very inferior degree to that which popular notions imply. It would not serve the purposes of war to represent these qualities as being what they are: we therefore dress them with factitious and alluring ornaments; and they have been dressed so long that we admire the show, and forget to enquire what is underneath. Our applauses of military virtues do not adorn them like the natural bloom of loveliness; it is the paint of that which, if seen, would not attract, if it did not repel us. They are not like the verdure which adorns the meadow, but the greenness that conceals a bog. If the reader says that we indulge in declamation, we invite, we solicit him to investigate the truth. And yet, without enquiring further, there is conclusive evidence in the fact, that glory, that praise, is the vital principle of military virtue. Let us take sound rules for our guides of judgment, and it is not possible, that we should regard any quality as possessing much virtue which lives only or chiefly upon praise. And who will pretend that the ranks of armies would be filled if no tongue talked of bravery and glory, and no newspaper published the achievements of a regiment?*

* "The virtues are nearly related, and live in the greatest harmony with each other."—OPIE.

“ Truth is a naked and open daylight, that doth not show the masques and mummeries and triumphs of the world half so stately and daintily as candlelights.”† Let us dismiss, then, that candlelight examination which men are wont to adopt when they contemplate military virtues, and see what appearance they exhibit in the daylight of truth. Military talent, and active courage, and patriotism, or some other motive, appear to be the foundations and the subjects of our applause.

* It is pleasant to hear an intelligent woman say, “I cannot tell how or why the love of glory is a less selfish principle than the love of riches:”* and it is pleasant to hear one of our then principal Reviews say, “Glory is the most selfish of all passions except love.”† That which is selfish can hardly be very virtuous.

† Lord Bacon: Essays.

---

* Memoirs of late Jane Taylor. † West. Rev. No. 13.

With respect to talent little needs to be said, since few have an opportunity of displaying it. An able general may exhibit his capacity for military affairs ; but of the mass of those who join in battles and participate in their "glories," little more is expected than that they should be obedient and brave.

Valor and bravery, however, may be exhibited by the many—not by generals and admirals alone, but by ensigns and midshipmen, by seamen and by privates. What then is valor, and what is bravery? "There is nothing great but what is virtuous, nor indeed truly great but what is composed and quiet."* There is much of truth in this. Yet where then is the greatness of bravery, for where is the composure and quietude of the quality? "Valor or active courage is for the most part constitutional, and therefore can have no more claim to moral merit than wit, beauty or health." † Accordingly, the question which we have just asked respecting military talent, may be especially asked respecting bravery. Cannot bravery be exhibited in common by the good and the bad?—Yet further. "It is a great weakness for a man to value himself upon any thing wherein he shall be outdone by fools and brutes." Is not the bravery of the bravest outdone even by brutes. When the soldier has vigorously assaulted the enemy, when though repulsed he returns to the conflict, when being wounded he still brandishes his sword, till it drops from his grasp by faintness or death—he surely is brave. What then is the moral rank to which he has attained? He has attained to the rank of a bull-dog. The dog, too, vigorously assails his enemy ; when tossed into the air he returns to the conflict ; when gored he still continues to bite, and yields not his hold until he is stunned or killed. Contemplating bravery as such, there is not a man in Britain or in Europe whose bravery entitles him to praise which he must not share with the combatants of a cockpit. Of the moral qualities that are components of bravery, the reader may form some conception from this language of a man who is said to be a large landed proprietor, a magistrate, and a member of parliament. "I am one of those who think that evil alone does not result from poaching. The risk poachers run from the dangers that beset them, added to their occupation being carried on in cold dark nights, begets a hardihood of frame and contempt of danger that is not without its value. I never heard or knew of a poacher being a coward. They all make good soldiers; and military men are well aware that two or three men in each troop or company, of bold and enterprising spirits, are not without their effect on their comrades." The same may of course be said of smugglers and highwaymen. If these are the characters in whom we are peculiarly to seek for bravery, what are the moral qualities of bravery itself! All just, all rational, and I will venture to affirm all permanent reputation refers to the mind or to virtue; and what connection has animal power or animal hardihood with intellect or goodness? I do not decry courage: he who was better acquainted than we are with the nature and worth of human actions, attached much value to courage, but he attached none to bravery.* Courage he recommended by his precepts and enforced by his example: bravery he never recommended at all. The wisdom of this distinction and its accordancy with the principles of his religion are plain. Bravery requires the existence of many of those dispositions which he disallowed.

➤ * Seneca. † Soame Jenyns: Internal Evid. of Christianity. Prop. 3.

* "Whatever merit valor may have assumed among pagans, with Christians it can pretend to none." Soame Jenyns: Internal Evid. of Christianity, Prop. 3.

Animosity, the desire of retaliation, the disposition to injure and destroy—all this is necessary to the existence of bravery, but all this is incompatible with Christianity. The courage which Christianity requires is to bravery what fortitude is to daring—an effort of the mental principles rather than of the spirits. It is a calm steady determinateness of purpose, that will not be diverted by solicitation or awed by fear. “Behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself.* What resemblance has bravery to courage like this? This courage is a virtue, and a virtue which it is difficult to acquire or to practise; and we have heedlessly or ingeniously transferred its praise to another quality which is inferior in its nature and easier to acquire, in order that we may obtain the reputation of virtue at a cheap rate.

Of those who thus extol the lower qualities of our nature, few perhaps are conscious to what a degree they are deluded. In exhibiting this delusion let us not forget the purpose for which it is done. The popular notion respecting bravery does not terminate in an innoxious mistake. The consequences are practically and greatly evil. He that has placed his hopes upon the praises of valor, desires of course an opportunity of acquiring them, and this opportunity he cannot find but in the destruction of men. That such powerful motives will lead to this destruction when even ambition can scarcely find a pretext, we need not the testimony of experience to assure us. It is enough that we consider the principles which actuate mankind.

And if we turn from actions to motives, from bravery to patriotism, we are presented with similar delusions, and with similar mischiefs as their consequence. To "fight nobly for our country," to "fall covered with glory in our country's cause," to "sacrifice our lives for the liberties and laws and religion of our country," are phrases in the mouth of multitudes. What do they mean, and to whom do they apply? We contend, that to say generally of those who perish in war that "they have died for their country," is simply untrue: and for this simple reason, that they did not fight for it. It is not true that patriotism is their motive. Why is a boy destined from school for the army? Is it that his father is more patriotic than his neighbor, who destines his son for the bar? Or if the boy himself begs his father to buy an ensigncy, is it because he loves his country, or is it because he dreams of glory, and admires scarlet and plumes and swords? The officer enters the service in order that he may obtain an income, not in order to benefit his fellow citizens. The private enters it because he prefers a soldier's life to another, or because he has no wish but the wish for change. And having entered the army, what is the motive that induces the private or his superiors to fight? It is that fighting is part of their business; that is one of the conditions upon which they were hired. Patriotism is not the motive. Of those who fall in battle, is there one in a hundred who even thinks of his country's good? He thinks perhaps of glory and of the fame of his regiment—he hopes perhaps that "Salamanca" or "Austerlitz" will henceforth be inscribed on its colors; but rational views of his country's welfare are foreign to his mind. He has scarcely a thought about the matter. He fights in battle as a horse draws in a carriage, because he is compelled to do it, or because he has done it before; but he probably thinks no more of his country's good than the same horse, if he were carrying corn to a granary, would think he was providing for the comforts of his master. The truth therefore is, that we give to the soldier that of which we are wont to be sufficiently sparing—a gratuitous concession of merit. If he but “fights bravely,” he is a patriot and secure of his praise.

* Acts xx. 22.

To sacrifice our lives for the liberties and laws and religion of our native land, are undoubtedly high-sounding words ; but who are they that will do it? Who is it that will sacrifice his life for his country? Will the senator who supports a war? Will the writer who declaims upon patriotism? Will the minister of religion who recommends the sacrifice? Take away war and its fictions, and there is not a man of them who will do it. Will he sacrifice his life at home? If the loss of his life in London or at York would procure just so much benefit to his country as the loss of one soldier’s in the field, would he be willing to lay his head upon the block? Is he willing, for such a contribution to his country’s good, to resign himself without notice and without remembrance to the executioner? Alas for the fictions of war! where is such a man? Men will not sacrifice their lives at all unless it be in war ; and they do not sacrifice them in war from motives of patriotism. In no rational use of language, therefore, can it be said that the soldier “dies for his country.”

Not that there may not be or that there have not been persons who fight from motives of patriotism. But the occurrence is comparatively rare. There may be physicians who qualify themselves for practice from motives of benevolence to the sick ; or lawyers who assume the gown in order to plead for the injured and oppressed ; but it is an unusual motive, and so is patriotism to the soldier.

And after all, even if all soldiers fought out of zeal for their country, what is the merit of patriotism itself? I do not say that it possesses no virtue, but I affirm and hope hereafter to show, that its virtue is extravagantly overrated,* and that if every one who fought did fight for his country, he would often be actuated only by a mode of selfishness—of selfishness which sacrifices the general interests of the species to the interests of a part.

Such and so low are the qualities which have obtained from deluded and deluding millions, fame, honors, glories. A prodigious structure, and almost without a base:—a structure so vast, so brilliant, so attractive, that the greater portion of mankind are content to gaze in admiration, without any enquiry into its basis or any solicitude for its durability. If, however, it should be that the gorgeous temple will be able to stand only till Christian truth and light become predominant, it surely will be wise of those who seek a niche in its apartments as their paramount and final good, to pause ere they proceed. If they desire a reputation that shall outlive guilt and fiction, let them look to the basis of military fame. If this fame should one day sink into oblivion and contempt, it will not be the first instance in which wide-spread glory has been found to be a glittering bubble that has burst and been forgotten. Look at the days of chivalry. Of the ten thousand Quixotes of the middle ages, where is now the honor or the name? Yet poets once sang their praises, and the chronicler of their achievements believed he was recording an everlasting fame. Where are now the glories of the tournament? Glories human passions are less mutable than human follies ; but I am willing to avow the conviction, that these glories are alike destined to sink into forgetfulness, and that the time is approaching when the applauses of heroism and the splendors of conquest will be remembered only as follies and iniquities that are past. Let him who seeks for fame other than that which an era of Christian purity will allow, make haste ; for every hour that he delays its acquisition will shorten its duration. This is certain if there be certainty in the promises of Heaven.

“Of which all Europe rang from side to side.”

Where is the champion whom princesses caressed and nobles envied? Where are the triumphs of Scotus and Aquinas, and where are the folios that perpetuated their fame? The glories of war have indeed outlived these;

* Essay III, c. 9.

But we must not forget the purpose for which these illustrations of the military virtues are offered to the reader ;—to remind him not merely that they are fictions, but fictions which are the occasion of excess of misery to mankind—to remind him that it is his business, from considerations of humanity and of religion, to refuse to give currency to the popular delusions—and to remind him that if he does promote them, he promotes, by the act, misery in all its forms and guilt in all its excesses. Upon such subjects, men are not left to exercise their own inclinations. Morality interposes its commands ; and they are commands which, if we would be moral, we must obey.

UNCHASTITY.—No portion of these pages is devoted to the enforcement of moral obligations upon this subject, partly because these obligations are commonly acknowledged how little soever they may be regarded, and partly because, as the reader will have seen, the object of these essays is to recommend those applications of the moral law which are frequently neglected in the practice even of respectable men.—But in reference to the influence of public opinion on offences connected with the sexual constitution, it will readily be perceived that something should be said, when it is considered that some of the popular notions respecting them are extravagantly inconsistent with the moral law. The want of chastity in a woman is visited by public opinion with the severest reprobation—in men, with very little or with none. Now, morality makes no such distinction. The offence is frequently adverted to in the Christian scriptures; but I believe there is no one precept which intimates that, in the estimation of its writer, there was any difference in the turpitude of the offence respectively in men and women. If it be in this volume that we are to seek for the principles of the moral law, how shall we defend the state of popular opinion? “If unchastity in a woman, whom St. Paul terms the glory of man, be such a scandal and dishonor, then certainly in a man, who is both the image and glory of God, it must, though commonly not so thought, be much more deflowering and dishonorable.”* But this departure from the moral law, like all other departures, produces its legitimate, that is, pernicious effects. The sex in whom popular opinion reprobates the offences, comparatively seldom commits them: the sex in whom it tolerates the offences, commits them to an enormous extent. It is obvious, therefore, that to promote the present state of popular opinion, is to promote and to encourage the want of chastity in men.

That some very beneficial consequences result from the strong direction of its current against the offence in a woman, is certain. The consciousness that upon the retention of her reputation depends so tremendous a stake, is probably a more efficacious motive to its preservation than any other. The abandonment to which the loss of personal integrity generally consigns a woman, is a perpetual and fearful warning to the sex. Almost every human being deprecates and dreads the general disfavor of mankind; and thus, notwithstanding temptations of all kinds, the number of women who do incur it is comparatively small.

* Milton: Christian Doctrine, p. 624.

But the fact that public opinion is thus powerful in restraining one sex, is a sufficient evidence that it would also be powerful in restraining the other. Waiving for the present the question whether the popular disapprobation of the crime in a woman is not too severe—if the man who was guilty was forthwith and immediately consigned to infamy : if he was expelled from virtuous society, and condemned for the remainder of life to the lowest degradation, how quickly would the frequency of the crime be diminished ! The reformation amongst men would effect a reformation amongst women too ; and the reciprocal temptations which each addresses to the other, would in a great degree be withdrawn. If there were few seducers few would be seduced ; and few therefore would in turn become the seducers of men.

But instead of this direction of public opinion, what is the ordinary language respecting the man who thus violates the moral law ? We are told that “ he is rather unsteady ; ” that “ there is a little of the young man about him ; ” that “ he is not free from indiscretions. ” And what is he likely to think of all this ? Why, that for a young man to have a little of the young man about him is perfectly natural ; that to be rather unsteady and a little indiscreet is not, to be sure, what one would wish, but that it is no great harm and will soon wear off. To employ such language is, we say, to encourage and promote the crime—a crime which brings more wretchedness and vice into the world than almost any other ; and for which, if Christianity is to be believed, the Universal Judge will call to a severe account. If the immediate agent be obnoxious to punishment, can he who encouraged him expect to escape ? I am persuaded that the frequency of this gross offence is attributable much more to the levity of public notions as founded upon levity of language, than to passion; and perhaps, therefore, some of those who promote this levity may be in every respect as criminal as if they committed the crime itself.

Women themselves contribute greatly to the common levity and to its attendant mischiefs. Many a female who talks in the language of abhorrence of an offending sister, and averts her eye in contumely if she meets her in the street, is perfectly willing to be the friend and intimate of the equally offending man. That such women are themselves duped by the vulgar distinction is not to be doubted—but then we are not to imagine that she who practises this inconsistency abhors the crime so much as the criminal. Her abhorrence is directed, not so much to the violation of the moral law as to the party by whom it is violated. “To little respect has that woman a claim on the score of modesty, though her reputation may be white as the driven snow, who smiles on the libertine whilst she spurns the victims of his lawless appetites.” No, no.—If such women would convince us that it is the impurity which they reprobate, let them reprobate it wherever it is found: if they would convince us that morals or philanthropy is their motive when they spurn the sinning sister, let them give proof by spurning him who has occasioned her to sin.

The common style of narrating occurrences and trials of seduction &c., in the public prints, is very mischievous. These flagitious actions are, it seems, a legitimate subject of merriment; one of the many droll things which a newspaper contains. It is humiliating to see respectable men sacrifice the interests of society to such small temptation. They pander to the appetite of the gross and idle of the public:—they want to sell their newspapers.—Much of this ill-timed merriment is found in the addresses of counsel, and this is one mode amongst the many in which the legal profession appears to think itself licensed to sacrifice virtue to the usages which it has, for its own advantage, adopted. There is cruelty as well as other vices in these things. When we take into account the intense suffering which prostitution produces upon its victims and upon their friends, he who contributes, even thus indirectly, to its extension, does not exhibit even a tolerable sensibility to human misery. Even infidelity acknowledges the claims of humanity; and therefore, if religion and religious morals were rejected, this heartless levity of language would still be indefensible. We call the man benevolent who relieves or diminishes wretchedness: what should we call him who extends and increases it?

In connection with this subject, an observation suggests itself respecting the power of character in affecting the whole moral principles of the mind. If loss of character does not follow a breach of morality, that breach may be single and alone. The agent's virtue is so far deteriorated, but the breach does not open wide the door to other modes of crime. If loss of character does follow one offence, one of the great barriers which exclude the flood of evil is thrown down; and though the offence which produced loss of character be really no greater than the offence with which it is retained, yet its consequences upon the moral condition are incomparably greater. The reason is, that if you take away a person's reputation you take away one of the principal motives to propriety of conduct. The laborer who, being tempted to steal a piece of bacon from the farmer, finds that no one will take him into his house or give him employment, and that wherever he goes he is pointed at as a thief, is almost as much driven as tempted to repeat the crime. His fellow laborer, who has much more heinously violated the moral law by a flagitious intrigue with a servant girl, receives from the farmer a few reproaches and a few jests, retains his place, never perhaps repeats the offence, and subsequently maintains a decent morality.

It has been said, "As a woman collects all her virtue into this point, the loss of her chastity is generally the destruction of her moral principle." What is to be understood by collecting virtue into one point, it is not easy to discover. The truth is, that as popular notions have agreed that she who loses her chastity shall retain no reputation, a principal motive to the practice of other virtues is taken away:—she therefore disregards them; and thus by degrees her moral principle is utterly depraved. If public opinion was so modified that the world did not abandon a woman who has been robbed of chastity, it is probable that a much larger number of these unhappy persons would return to virtue. The case of men offers illustration and proof. The unchaste man retains his character, or at any rate he retains so much that it is of great importance to him to preserve the remainder. Public opinion accordingly holds its strong rein upon other parts of his conduct, and by this rein he is restrained from deviating into other walks of vice. If the direction of public opinion were exchanged, if the woman's offence was held venial and the man's infamous, the world might stand in wonder at the altered scene. We should have worthy and respectable prostitutes, while the men whom we now invite to our tables and marry to our daughters, would be repulsed as the most abandoned of mankind. Of this I have met with a curious illustration.—Amongst the North American Indians "seduction is regarded as a despicable crime, and more blame is attached to the man than to the woman:

hence the offence on the part of the female is more readily forgotten and forgiven, and she finds little or no difficulty in forming a subsequent matrimonial alliance when deserted by her betrayer, who is generally regarded with distrust, and avoided in social intercourse."*

It becomes a serious question how we shall fix upon the degree in which diminution of character ought to be consequent upon offences against morality. It is not I think too much to say, that no single crime, once committed, under the influence perhaps of strong temptation, ought to occasion such a loss of character as to make the individual regard himself as abandoned. I make no exceptions—not even for murder. I am persuaded that some murders are committed with less of personal guilt than is sometimes involved in much smaller crimes; but however that may be, there is no reason why, even to the murderer, the motives and the avenues to amendment should be closed. Still less ought they to be closed against the female who is perhaps the victim—strictly the victim of seduction. Yet if the public do not express, and strongly express, their disapprobation, we have seen that they practically encourage offences. In this difficulty I know of no better and no other guide than that system which the tenor of Christianity prescribes—abhorrence of the evil and commiseration of him who commits it. The union of these dispositions will be likely to produce, with respect to offenses of all kinds, that conduct which most effectually tends to discountenance them, while it as effectually tends to reform the offenders. These, however, are not the dispositions which actuate the public in measuring their reprobation of unchastity in women. Something probably might rightly be deducted from the severity with which their offence is visited: much may be rightly altered in the motives which induce this severity. And as to men, much should be added to the quantum of reprobation, and much correction should be applied to the principles by which it is regulated.

* Hunter's Memoirs.

FAME. —The observations which were offered respecting contributing to the passion for glory, involve kindred doctrines respecting contributions generally to individual fame. If the pretensions of those with whose applauses the popular voice is filled, were examined by the only proper test, the test which Christianity allows, it would be found that multitudes whom the world thus honors must be shorn of their beams. Before Bacon's daylight of truth, poets and statesmen and philosophers without number would hide their diminished heads. The mighty indeed would be fallen. Yet it is for the acquisition of this fame that multitudes toil. It is their motive to action ; and they pursue that conduct which will procure fame whether it ought to procure it or not. The inference as to the duties of individuals in contributing to fame, is obvious.

“The profligacy of a man of fashion is looked upon with much less contempt and aversion than that of a man of meaner condition”* It ought to be looked upon with much more. But men of fashion are not our concern. Our business is with men of talent and genius, with the eminent and the great. The profligacy of these, too, is regarded with much less of aversion than that of less gifted men. To be great, whether intellectually or otherwise, is often like a passport to impunity ; and men talk as if we ought to speak leniently of the faults of a man who delights us by his genius or his talent. This precisely is the man whose faults we should be most prompt to mark, because he is the man whose faults are most seducing to the world. Intellectual superiority brings, no doubt, its congenial temptations. Let these affect our judgments of the man, but let them not diminish our reprobation of his offences. So to extenuate the individual as to apologize for his faults, is to injure the cause of virtue in one of its most vulnerable parts. "Oh! that I could see in men who oppose tyranny in the state, a disdain of the tyranny of low passions in themselves. I cannot reconcile myself to the idea of an immoral patriot, or to that separation of private from public virtue which some men think to be possible."* Probably it is possible: probably there may be such a thing as an immoral patriot: for public opinion applauds the patriotism without condemning the immorality. If men constantly made a fit deduction from their praises of public virtue on account of its association with private vice, the union would frequently be severed; and he who hoped for celebrity from the public would find it needful to be good as well as great. He who applauds human excellence and really admires it, should endeavor to make its examples as pure and perfect as he can. He should hold out a motive to consistency of excellence, by evincing that nothing else can obtain praise unmingled with censure. This endeavor should be constant and uniform. The hearer should never be allowed to suppose that in appreciating a person's merits, we are indifferent to his faults. It has been complained of one of our principal works of periodical literature, that amongst its many and ardent praises of Shakespeare, it has almost never alluded to his indecencies. The silence is reprehensible: for what is a reader to conclude but that indecency is a very venial offence? Under such circumstances, not to be with morality is to be against it. Silence is positive mischief.

* Ad. Smith : Theo. Mor. Sent.

*Dr. Price: Revolution Sermon.

People talk to us of liberality, and of allowances for the aberrations of genius, and for the temptations of greatness. It is well. Let the allowances be made.—But this is frequently only affectation of candor. It is not that we are lenient to failings, but that we are indifferent to vice. It is not even enlightened benevolence to genius or greatness itself. The faults and vices with which talented men are chargeable deduct greatly from their own happiness; and it cannot be doubted that their misdeeds have been the more willingly committed from the consciousness that apologists would be found amongst the admiring world. It is sufficient to make that world knit its brows in anger, to insist upon the moral demerits of a Robert Burns. Pathetic and voluble extenuations are instantly urged. There are extenuations of such a man's vices, and they ought to be regarded: but no extenuations can remove the charge of voluntary and intentional violations of morality. Let us not hear of the enthusiasm of poetry. Men do not write poetry as they chatter with their neighbors: they sit down to a deliberate act; and he who in his verses offends against morals, intentionally and deliberately offends.

After all, posterity exercises some justice in its award. When the first glitter and the first applauses are past—when death and a few years of sobriety have given opportunity to the public mind to attend to truth, it makes a deduction, though not a due deduction, for the shaded portions of the great man's character. It is not forgotten that Marlborough was avaricious, that Bacon was mean; and there are great names of the present day of whom it will not be forgotten that they had deep and dark shades in their reputation. It is perhaps wonderful that those who seek for fame are so indifferent to these deductions from its amount. Supposing the intellectual pretensions of

Newton and Voltaire were equal, how different is their fame! How many and how great qualifications are employed in praising the one! How few and how small in praising the other! Editions of the works of some of our first writers are advertised, "in which the exceptionable passages are expunged." How foolish, how uncalculating even as to celebrity, to have inserted these passages! To write in the hope of fame, works which posterity will mutilate before they place them in their libraries!—Charles James Fox said, that if, during his administration, they could effect the abolition of the slave trade, it "would entail more true glory upon them, and more honor upon their country, than any other transaction in which they could be engaged."* If this be true, (and who will dispute it?) ministers usually provide very ill for their reputation with posterity. How anxiously devoted to measures comparatively insignificant! How phlegmatic respecting those calls of humanity and public principle, a regard of which will alone secure the permanent honors of the world! It may safely be relied upon, that "much more unperishable is the greatness of goodness than the greatness of power," † or the greatness of talent. And the difference will progressively increase. If, as there is reason to believe, the moral condition of mankind will improve, their estimate of the good portion of a great man's character will be enhanced, and their reprobation of the bad will become more intense—until at length it will perhaps be found, respecting some of those who now receive the applauses of the world, that the balance of public opinion is against them, and that, in the universal estimate of merit and demerit, they will be ranked on the side of the latter. These motives to virtue in great men are not addressed to the Christian: he has higher motives and better: but since it is more desirable that a man should act well from imperfect motives than that he should act ill, we urge him to regard the integrity of his fame.

* Fell's Memoirs.

† Sir R. K. Porter.

THE PRESS.—It is manifest that if the obligations which have been urged apply to those who speak, they apply with tenfold responsibility to those who write. The man who, in talking to half a dozen of his acquaintance, contributes to confuse or pervert their moral notions, is accountable for the mischief which he may do six persons. He who writes a book containing similar language, is answerable for a so much greater amount of mischief as the number of his readers may exceed six, and as the influence of books exceeds that of conversation, by the evidence of greater deliberation in their contents and by the greater attention which is paid by the reader. It is not a light matter, even in this view, to write a book for the public. We very insufficiently consider the amount of the obligations and the extent of the responsibility which we entail upon ourselves. Every one knows the power of the press in influencing the public mind. He that publishes five hundred copies of a book, of which any part is likely to derange the moral judgment of a reader, contributes materially to the propagation of evil. If each of his books is read by four persons, he endangers the infliction of this evil, whatever be its amount, upon two thousand minds. Who shall tell the sum of the mischief? In this country the periodical press is a powerful engine for evil or for good. The influence of the contents of one number of a newspaper may be small, but it is perpetually recurring. The editor of a journal, of which no more than a thousand copies are circulated in a week, and each of which is read by half a dozen persons, undertakes in a year a part of the moral guidance of thirty thousand individuals. Of some daily papers the number of readers is so great, that in the course of twelve months they may influence the opinions and the conduct of six or eight millions of men. To say nothing therefore of editors who intentionally mislead and vitiate the public, and remembering with what carelessness respecting the moral tendency of articles a newspaper is filled, it may safely be concluded that some creditable editors do harm in the world to an extent, in comparison with which robberies and treasons are as nothing.

It is not easy to imagine the sum of advantages which would result if the periodical press not only excluded that which does harm, but preferred that which does good. Not that grave moralities, not, especially, that religious disquisitions, are to be desired ; but that every reader should see and feel that the editor maintained an allegiance to virtue and to truth. There is hardly any class of topics in which this allegiance may not be manifested, and manifested without any incongruous associations. You may relate the common occurrences of the day in such a manner as to do either good or evil. The trial of a thief, the particulars of a conflagration, the death of a statesman, the criticism of a debate, and a hundred other matters, may be recorded so as to exercise a moral influence over the reader for the better or the worse. That the influence is frequently for the worse needs no proof ; and it is so much the less defensible because it may be changed to the contrary without a word, directly, respecting morals or religion.

However, newspapers do much more good than harm, especially in politics. They are in this country one of the most vigorous and beneficial instruments of political advantage. They effect incalculable benefit both in checking the statesman who would abuse power, and in so influencing the public opinion as to prepare it for, and therefore to render necessary, an amelioration of political and civil institutions. The great desideratum is enlargement of views and purity of principle. We want in editorial labors less of partizanship, less of petty squabbles about the worthless discussions of the day : we want more of the philosophy of politics, more of that grasping intelligence which can send a reader's reflections from facts to principles. Our journals are, to what they ought to be, what a chronicle of the middle ages is to a philosophical history. The disjointed fragments of political intelligence ought to be connected by a sort of enlightened running commentary. There is talent enough embarked in some of these ; but the talent too commonly expends itself upon subjects and in speculations which are of little interest beyond the present week.

And here we are reminded of that miserable direction to public opinion which is given in historical works.* I do not speak of party bias, though that is sufficiently mischievous ; but of the irrational selection by historians of comparatively unimportant things to fill the greater portion of their pages. People exclaim that the history of Europe is little more than a history of human violence and wickedness. But they confound history with that portion of history which historians record. That portion is doubtless written almost in blood—but it is a very small, and in truth a very subordinate portion. The intrigues of cabinets ; the rise and fall of ministers ; wars and battles, and victories and defeats ; the plunder of provinces ; the dismemberment of empires ; these are the things which fill the pages of the historian, but these are not the things which compose the history of man. He that would acquaint himself with the history of his species, must apply to other and to calmer scenes. "It is a cruel mortification, in searching for what is instructive in the history of past times, to find that the exploits of conquerors who have desolated the earth and the freaks of tyrants who have rendered nations unhappy, are recorded with minute and often disgusting accuracy, while the discovery of useful arts and the progress of the most beneficial branches of commerce, are passed over in silence, and suffered to sink into oblivion."* Even a more cruel mortification than this is to find recorded almost nothing respecting the intellectual and moral history of man. You are presented with five or six weighty volumes which profess to be a history of England; and after reading them to the end you have hardly found any thing to satisfy that interesting question—how has my country been enabled to advance from barbarism to civilization; to come forth from darkness into light? Yes, by applying philosophy to facts yourself, you may attain some, though it be but an imperfect, reply. But the historian himself should have done this. The facts of history, simply as such, are of comparatively little concern. He is the true historian of man who regards mere facts rather as the illustrations of history than as its subject matter. As to the history of cabinets and courts, of intrigue and oppression, of campaigns and generals, we can almost spare it all. It is of wonderfully little consequence whether they are remembered or not, except as lessons of instruction—except as proofs of the evils of bad principles and bad institutions. For any other purpose, Blenheim! we can spare thee. And Louis, even Louis "le grande!" we can spare thee. And thy successor and his Pompadour! we can spare ye all.

* “ Next to the guilt of those who commit wicked actions, is that of the historian who glosses them over and excuses them.” Southey: Book of the Church, c. 8.

Much power is in the hands of the historian if he will exert it: if he will make the occurrences of the past subservient to the elucidations of the principles of human nature—of the principles of political truth—of the rules of political rectitude ; if he will refuse to make men ambitious of power by filling his pages with the feats or freaks of men in power ; if he will give no currency to the vulgar delusions about glory :—if he will do these things, and such as these, he will deserve well of his country and of man ; for he will contribute to that rectification of public opinion which, when it is complete and determinate, will be the most powerful of all earthly agents in ameliorating the social condition of the world.

* Robertson: Disq. on Anct. Comm. of India.

---

CHAPTER X.

MORAL EDUCATION.

Union of moral principle with the affections—Society—Morality of the Ancient Classics—The supply of motives to virtue—Conscience—Subjugation of the will—Knowledge of our own minds—Offices of public worship.

To a good moral education, two things are necessary : That the young should receive information respecting what is right and what is wrong ; and, That they should be furnished with motives to adhere to what is right. We should communicate moral knowledge and moral dispositions.

I. In the endeavor to attain these ends, there is one great pervading difficulty, consisting in the imperfection and impurity of the actual moral condition of mankind. Without referring at present to that moral guidance with which all men, however circumstanced, are furnished,* it is evident that much of the practical moral education which an individual receives, is acquired by habit, and from the actions, opinions, and general example of those around him. It is thus that, to a great extent, he acquires his moral education. He adopts the notions of others, acquires insensibly a similar set of principles, and forms to himself a similar scale of right and wrong. It is manifest that the learner in such a school will often be taught amiss. Yet how can we prevent him from being so taught? or what system of moral education is likely to avail in opposition to the contagion of example and the influence of notions insensibly, yet constantly instilled? It is to little purpose to take a boy every morning into a closet, and there teach him moral and religious truths for an hour, if so soon as the hour is expired, he is left for the remainder of the day in circumstances in which these truths are not recommended by any living examples.

* See Essay I., c. vi.

One of the first and greatest requisites, therefore, in moral education, is a situation in which the knowledge and the practice of morality is inculcated by the habitually virtuous conduct of others. The boy who is placed in such a situation is in an efficient moral school, though he may never hear delivered formal rules of conduct: so that, if parents should ask how they may best give their child a moral education, I answer, Be virtuous yourselves.

The young, however, are unavoidably subjected to bad example as to good: many who may see consistent practical lessons of virtue in their parents' parlors, must see much that is contrary elsewhere; and we must, if we can, so rectify the moral perceptions and invigorate the moral dispositions, that the mind shall effectually resist the insinuation of evil.

Religion is the basis of morality. He that would impart moral knowledge must begin by imparting a knowledge of God. We are not advocates of formal instruction—of lesson learning—in moral any more than in intellectual education. Not that we affirm it is undesirable to make a young person commit to memory maxims of religious truth and moral duty. These things may be right but they are not the really efficient means of forming the moral character of the young. These maxims should recommend themselves to the judgment and affections, and this can hardly be hoped whilst they are presented only in a didactic and insulated form to the mind. It is one of the characteristics of the times, that there is a prodigious increase of books that are calculated to benefit whilst they delight the young. These are effective instruments in teaching morality. A simple narrative, (of facts, if it be possible,) in which integrity of principle and purity of conduct are recommended to the affections as well as to the judgment—without affectation, or improbabilities, or factitious sentiment, is likely to effect substantial good. And if these associations are judiciously renewed, the good is likely to be permanent as well as substantial. It is not a light task to write such books, nor to select them. Authors color their pictures too highly. They must indeed interest the young, or they will not be read with pleasure: but the anxiety to give interest is too great, and the effects may be expected to diminish as the narrative recedes from congeniality to the actual condition of mankind.

A judicious parent will often find that the moral culture of his child may be promoted without seeming to have the object in view. There are many opportunities which present themselves for associating virtue with his affections—for throwing in amongst the accumulating mass of mental habits, principles of rectitude which shall pervade and meliorate the whole.

As the mind acquires an increased capacity of judging, I would offer to the young person a sound exhibition, if such can be found, of the principles of morality. He should know, with as great distinctness as possible, not only his duty, but the reasons of it. It has very unfortunately happened that those who have professed to deliver the principles of morality, have commonly intermingled error with truth, or have set out with propositions fundamentally unsound. These books effect, it is probable, more injury than benefit. Their truths, for they contain truths, are frequently deduced from fallacious premises—from premises from which it is equally easy to deduce errors. The fallacies of the moral philosophy of Paley are now in part detected by the public: there was a time when his opinions were regarded as more nearly oracular than now; and at that time and up to the present time, the book has effectually confused the moral notions of multitudes of readers. If the reader thinks that the principles which have been proposed in the present essays are just, he might derive some assistance from them in conducting the moral education of his elder children.

There is negative as well as positive education—some things to avoid as well as some to do. Of the things which are to be avoided, the most obvious is unfit society for the young. If a boy mixes without restraint in whatever society he pleases, his education will in general be practically bad; because the world in general is bad: its moral condition is below the medium between perfect purity and utter depravation. Nevertheless, he must at some period mix in society with almost all sorts of men, and therefore he must be prepared for it. Very young children should be excluded if possible from all unfit association, because they acquire habits before they possess a sufficiency of counteracting principle. But if a parent has, within his own house, sufficiently endeavored to confirm and invigorate the moral character of his child, it were worse than fruitless to endeavor to retain him in the seclusion of a monk. He should feel the necessity and acquire the power of resisting temptation, by being subjected, gradually subjected, to that temptation which must one day be presented to him. In the endlessly diversified circumstances of families, no suggestion of prudence will be applicable to all; but if a parent is conscious that the moral tendency of his domestic associations is good, it will probably be wise to send his children to day-schools rather than to send them wholly from his family. Schools, as moral instruments, contain much both of good and evil: perhaps no means will be more effectual in securing much of the good and avoiding much of the evil, than that of allowing his children to spend their evenings and early mornings at home.

In ruminating upon moral education, we cannot, at least in this age of reading, disregard the influence of books. That a young person should not read every book is plain. No discrimination can be attempted here; but it may be observed that the best species of discrimination is that which is supplied by a rectified condition of the mind itself. The best species of prohibition is not that which a parent pronounces, but that which is pronounced by purified tastes and inclinations in the mind of the young. Not that the parent or tutor can expect that all or many of his children will adequately make this judicious discrimination; but if he cannot do every thing he can do much. There are many persons whom a contemptible or vicious book disgusts, notwithstanding the fascinations which it may contain. This disgust is the result of education in a large sense; and some portion of this disgust and of the discrimination which results from it, may be induced into the mind of a boy by having made him familiar with superior productions. He who is accustomed to good society, feels little temptation to join in the vociferations of an alehouse.

And here it appears necessary to advert to the moral tendency of studying, without selection, the ancient classics. The mode in which the writings of the Greek and Latin authors operate, is not an ordinary mode. We do not approach them as we approach ordinary books, but with a sort of habitual admiration, which makes their influence, whatever be its nature, peculiarly strong. That admiration would be powerful alike for good or for evil. Whether the tendency be good or evil, the admiration will make it great.

Now, previous to enquiring what the positive ill tendency of these writings is—what is not their tendency? They are pagan books for Christian children. They neither inculcate Christianity, nor Christian dispositions, nor the love of Christianity. But their tendency is not negative merely. They do inculcate that which is adverse to Christianity and to Christian dispositions. They set up, as exalted virtues, that which our own religion never countenanced, if it has not specifically condemned. They censure as faults dispositions which our own religion enjoins, or dispositions so similar that the young will not discriminate between them. If we enthusiastically admire these works, who will pretend that we shall not admire the moral qualities which they applaud? Who will pretend that the mind of a young person accurately adjusts his admiration to those subjects only which Christianity approves? No: we admire them as a whole; not perhaps every sentence or every sentiment, but we admire their general spirit and character. In a word, we admire that which our own religion teaches us not to imitate. And what makes the effect the more intense is, that we do this at the period of life when we are every day acquiring our moral notions. We mingle them up with our early associations respecting right and wrong—with associations which commonly extend their influence over the remainder of life.*

A very able essay, which obtained the Norrisian Medal at Cambridge for 1825, forcibly illustrates these propositions ; and the illustration is so much the more valuable, because it appears to have been undesigned. The title is, “ No valid argument can be drawn from the incredulity of the heathen philosophers against the truth of the Christian religion.”† The object of the work is to show, by a reference to their writings, that the general system of their opinions, feelings, prejudices, principles, and conduct, was utterly incongruous with Christianity ; and that, in consequence of these principles, &c., they actually did reject the religion. This is shown with great clearness of evidence ; it is shown that a class of men, who thought and wrote as these philosophers thought and wrote, would be extremely indisposed to adopt the religion and morality which Christ had introduced. Now, this appears to me to be conclusive of the question as to the present tendency of their writings. If the principles and prejudices of these persons indisposed them to the acceptance of Christianity, those prejudices and principles will indispose the man who admires and imbibes them in the present day. Not that they will now produce the effect in the same degrce. We are now surrounded with many other media by which opinions and principles are induced, and these are frequently influenced by the spirit of Christianity. The study and the admiration of these writings may not therefore be expected to make men absolutely reject Christianity, but to indispose them, in a greater or less degree, for the hearty acceptance of Christian principles as their rules of conduct.

* “ All education which inculcates Christian opinions with pagan tastes, awakens conscience but to tamper with it.” Schimmelpenninck : Biblical Fragments.

† By James Amiraux Jeremie.

Propositions have been made to supply young persons with selected ancient authors, or perhaps with editions in which exceptionable passages are expunged. I do not think that this will greatly avail. It is not, I think, the broad indecencies of Ovid, nor any other insulated class of sentiments or descriptions, that effects the great mischief; it is the pervading spirit and tenor of the whole—a spirit and tenor from which Christianity is not only excluded, but which is actually and greatly adverse to Christianity. There is indeed one considerable benefit that is likely to result from such a selection, and from expunging particular passages. Boys in ordinary schools do not learn enough of the classics to acquire much of their general moral spirit, but they acquire enough to be influenced, and injuriously influenced, by being familiar with licentious language; and, at any rate, he essentially subserves the interests of morality, who diminishes the power of opposing influences though he cannot wholly destroy it.

Finally, the mode in which intellectual education, generally, is acquired, may be made either an auxiliary of moral education or the contrary. A young person may store his mind with literature and science, and together, with the acquisition, either corrupt his principles, or amend and invigorate them. The world is so abundantly supplied with the means of knowledge—there are so many paths to the desired temple, that we may choose our own and yet arrive at it. He that thinks he cannot possess sufficient knowledge without plucking fruit of unhallowed trees, surely does not know how boundless is the variety and number of those which bear wholesome fruit. He cannot indeed know everything without studying the bad ; which, however, is no more to be recommended in literature than in life. A man cannot know all the varieties of human society without taking up his abode with felons and cannibals.

II. But, in reality, the second division of moral education is the more important of the two—the supply of motives to adhere to what is right. Our great deficiency is not in knowledge but in obedience. Of the offences which an individual commits against the moral law, the great majority are committed in the consciousness that he is doing wrong. Moral education therefore should be directed, not so much to informing the young what they ought to do, as to inducing those moral dispositions and principles which will make them adhere to what they know to be right.

The human mind, of itself, is in a state something like that of men in a state of nature, where separate and conflicting desires and motives are not restrained by any acknowledged head. Government, as it is necessary to society, is necessary in the individual mind. To the internal community of the heart the great question is, Who shall be the legislator? Who shall regulate and restrain the passions and affections? Who shall command and direct the conduct?—To these questions the breast of every man supplies him with an answer. He knows, because he feels that there is a rightful legislator in his own heart: he knows, because he feels, that he ought to obey it.

By whatever designation the reader may think it fit to indicate this legislator, whether he calls it the law written in the heart, or moral sense, or moral instinct, or conscience, we arrive at one practical truth at last ; that to the moral legislation which does actually subsist in the human mind, it is right that the individual should conform his conduct.

The great point then is, to induce him to do this—to induce him, when inclination and this law are at variance, to sacrifice the inclination to the law; and for this purpose it appears proper, first to impress him with a high, that is, with an accurate estimate of the authority of the law itself. We have seen that this law embraces an actual expression of the will of God; and we have seen that, even although the conscience may not always be adequately enlightened, it nevertheless constitutes to the individual an authoritative law. It is to the conscientious internal apprehension of rectitude that we should conform our conduct. Such appears to be the will of God.

It should therefore be especially inculcated, that the dictate of conscience is never to be sacrificed; that whatever may be the consequences of conforming to it, they are to be ventured. Obedience is to be unconditional—no questions about the utility of the law—no computations of the consequences of obedience—no presuming upon the lenity of the Divine government. “It is important so to regulate the understanding and imagination of the young, that they may be prepared to obey, even when they do not see the reasons of the commands of God.” “We should certainly endeavor where we can, to show them the reasons of the Divine commands, and this more and more as their understandings gain strength; but let it be obvious to them that we do ourselves consider it as quite sufficient if God has commanded us to do or to avoid anything.”*

Obedience to this internal legislator is not, like obedience to civil government, enforced. The law is promulgated, but the passions and inclinations can refuse obedience if they will. Penalties and rewards are indeed annexed; but he who braves the penalty, and disregards the reward, may continue to violate the law.

* Carpenter : Principles of Education.

Obedience therefore must be voluntary, and hence the paramount importance, in moral education, of habitually subjecting the will. "Parents," says Hartley, "should labor, from the earliest dawns of understanding and desire, to check the growing obstinacy of the will, curb all sallies of passion, impress the deepest, most amiable, reverential, and awful impressions of God, a future state, and all sacred things."—"Religious persons in all periods, who have possessed the light of revelation, have in a particular manner been sensible that the habit of self-control lies at the foundation of moral worth."* There is nothing mean or mean-spirited in this. It is magnanimous in philosophy as it is right in morals. It is the subjugation of the lower qualities of our nature to wisdom and to goodness.

The subjugation of the will to the dictates of a higher law, must be endeavored, if we would succeed, almost in infancy and in very little things; from the earliest dawns, as Hartley says, of understanding and desire. Children must first obey their parents, and those who have the care of them. The habit of sacrificing the will to another judgment being thus acquired, the mind is prepared to sacrifice the will to the judgment pronounced within itself. Show, in every practicable case, why you cross the inclinations of a child. Let obedience be as little blind as it may be. It is a great failing of some parents that they will not descend from the imperative mood, and that they seem to think it a derogation from their authority to place their orders upon any other foundation than their wills. But if the child sees—and children are wonderfully quick-sighted in such things—if the child sees that the will is that which governs his parent, how shall he efficiently learn that the will should not govern himself?

* Carpenter : Principles of Education.

The internal law carries with it the voucher of its own reasonableness. A person does not need to be told that it is proper and right to obey that law. The perception of this rectitude and propriety is coincident with the dictates themselves. Let the parent, then, very frequently refer his son and his daughter to their own minds; let him teach them to seek for instruction there. There are dangers on every hand, and dangers even here. The parent must refer them, if it be possible, not merely to conscience but to enlightened conscience. He must unite the two branches of moral education, and communicate the knowledge whilst he endeavors to induce the practice of morality. Without this, his children may obey their consciences, and yet be in error, and perhaps in fanaticism. With it, he may hope that their conduct will be both conscientious, and pure, and right. Nevertheless, an habitual reference to the internal law is the great, the primary concern; for the great majority of a man's moral perceptions are accordant with truth.

There is one consequence attendant upon this habitual reference to the internal law, which is highly beneficial to the moral character. It leads us to fulfil the wise instruction of antiquity, Know thyself. It makes us look within ourselves: it brings us acquainted with the little and busy world that is within us, with its many inhabitants and their dispositions and with their tendencies to evil or to good. This is valuable knowledge; and knowledge for want of which, it may be feared, the virtue of many has been wrecked in the hour of tempest. A man's enemies are those of his own household; and if he does not know their insidiousness and their strength, if he does not know upon what to depend for assistance, nor where is the probable point of attack, it is not likely that he will efficiently resist. Such a man is in the situation of the governor of an unprepared and surprised city. He knows not to whom to apply for effectual help, and finds perhaps that those whom he has loved and trusted are the first to desert or betray him. He feebly resists, soon capitulates, and at last scarcely knows why he did not make a successful defence.

It is to be regretted that, in the moral education which commonly obtains, whether formal or incidental, there is little that is calculated to produce this acquaintance with our own minds; little that refers us to ourselves, and much, very much, that calls and sends us away. Of many it is not too much to say that they receive almost no moral culture. The plant of virtue is suffered to grow as a tree grows in a forest, and takes its chance of storm or sunshine. This, which is good for oaks and pines, is not good for man. The general atmosphere around him is infected, and the juices of the moral plant are often themselves unhealthy.

In the nursery, formularies and creeds are taught; but this does not refer the child to its own mind. Indeed, unless a wakeful solicitude is maintained by those who teach, the tendency is the reverse. The mind is kept from habits of introversion, even in the offices of religion, by practically directing its attention to the tongue. "Many, it is to be feared, imagine that they are giving their children religious principles when they are only teaching them religious truths." You cannot impart moral education as you teach a child to spell.

From the nursery a boy is sent to school. He spends six or eight hours of the day in the school-room, and the remainder is employed in the sports of boyhood. Once, or it may be twice, in the day he repeats a form of prayer, and on one day in the week he goes to church. There is very little in all this to make him acquainted with the internal community ; and habit, if nothing else, calls his reflections away.

From school or from college the business of life is begun. It can require no argument to show, that the ordinary pursuits of life have little tendency to direct a man's meditations to the moral condition of his own mind, or that they have much tendency to employ them upon other and very different things.

Nay, even the offices of public devotion have almost a tendency to keep the mind without itself. What if we say that the self-contemplation which even natural religion is likely to produce, is obstructed by the forms of Christian worship? "The transitions from one office of devotion to another, are contrived, like scenes in the drama, to supply the mind with a succession of diversified engagements."* This supply of diversified engagements, whatever may be its value in other respects, has evidently the tendency of which we speak. It is not designed to supply, and it does not supply, the opportunity for calmness of recollection. A man must abstract himself from the external service if he would investigate the character and dispositions of the inmates of his own breast. Even the architecture and decorations of "churches" come in aid of the general tendency. They make the eye an auxiliary of the ear, and both keep the mind at a distance from those concerns which are peculiarly its own ; from contemplating its own weaknesses and wants ; and from applying to God for that peculiar help, which perhaps itself only needs, and which God only can impart. So little are the course of education and the subsequent engagements of life calculated to foster this great auxiliary of moral character. It is difficult, in the wide world, to foster it as much as is needful. Nothing but wakeful solicitude on the part of the parent can be expected sufficiently to direct the mind within ; whilst the general tendency of our associations and habits is to keep it without. Let him, however, do what he can. The habitual reference to the dictates of conscience may be promoted in the very young mind. This habit, like others, becomes strong by exercise. He that is faithful in little things is intrusted with more ; and this is true in respect of knowledge as in respect of other departments of the Christian life. Fidelity of obedience is commonly succeeded by increase of light ; and every act of obedience and every addition to knowledge furnishes new and still stronger inducements to persevere in the same course. Acquaintance with ourselves is the inseparable attendant of this course. We know the character and dispositions of our own inmates by frequent association with them : and if this fidelity to the internal law, and consequent knowledge of the internal world, be acquired in early life, the parent may reasonably hope that it will never wholly lose its efficiency amidst the bustle and anxieties of the world.

* Paley, p. 3. b. 5, c. 5.

Undoubtedly, this most efficient security of moral character is not likely fully to operate during the continuance of the present state of society and of its institutions. It is I believe true, that the practice of morality is most complete amongst those persons who peculiarly recommend a reference to the internal law, and whose institutions, religious and social, are congruous with the habit of this reference. Their history exhibits a more unshaken adherence to that which they conceived to be right—fewer sacrifices of conscience to interest or the dread of suffering—less of trimming between conflicting motives—more, in a word, of adherence to rectitude without regard to consequences. We have seen that such persons are likely to form accurate views of rectitude ; but whether they be accurate or not, does not affect the value of their moral education as securing fidelity to the degree of knowledge which they possess. It is of more consequence to adhere steadily to conscience though it may not be perfectly enlightened, than to possess perfect knowledge without consistency of obedience. But in reality they who obey most, know most; and we say that the general testimony of experience is, that those persons exhibit the most unyielding fidelity to the moral law whose moral education has peculiarly directed them to the law written in the heart.

---

CHAPTER XI.

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

Advantages of extended education—Infant schools—Habits of enquiry.

WHETHER the education of those who are not able to pay for educating themselves ought to be a private or a national charge, it is not our present business to discuss. It is in this country, at least, left to the voluntary benevolence of individuals, and this consideration may apologize for a brief reference to it here.

It is not long since it was a question whether the poor should be educated or not. That time is past, and it may be hoped the time will soon be passed when it shall be a question, To what extent?—that the time will soon arrive when it will be agreed that no limit needs to be assigned to the education of the poor, but that which is assigned by their own necessities, or which ought to be assigned to the education of all men. There appears no more reason for excluding a poor man from the fields of knowledge, than for preventing him from using his eyes. The mental and the visual powers were alike given to be employed. A man should, indeed, "shut his eyes from seeing evil," but whatever reason there is for letting him see all that is beautiful, and excellent, and innocent in nature and in art, there is the same for enabling his mind to expatiate in the fields of knowledge.

The objections which are urged against this extended education, are of the same kind as those which were urged against any education. They insist upon the probability of abuse. It was said, They who can write may forge; they who can read may read what is pernicious. The answer was, or it might have been—They who can hear, may hear profaneness and learn it; they who can see, may see bad examples and follow them:—but are we therefore to stop our ears and put out our eyes?—It is now said, that if you give extended education to the poor, you will elevate them above their stations; that a critic would not drive a wheelbarrow, and that a philosopher would not shoe horses, or weave cloth. But these consequences are without the limits of possibility; because the question for a poor man is, whether he shall perform such offices or starve: and surely it will not be pretended that hungry men would rather criticise than eat. Science and literature would not solicit a poor man from his labor more irresistibly than ease and pleasure do now; yet in spite of these solicitations what is the fact? That the poor man works for his bread. This is the inevitable result.

It is not the positive but the relative amount of knowledge that elevates a man above his station in society. It is not because he knows much, but because he knows more than his fellows. Educate all, and none will fancy that he is superior to his neighbors. Besides, we assign to the possession of knowledge, effects which are produced rather by habits of life. Ease and comparative leisure are commonly attendant upon extensive knowledge, and leisure and ease disqualify men for the laborious occupations much more than the knowledge itself.

There are some collateral advantages of an extended education of the people, which are of much importance. It has been observed that if the French had been an educated people, many of the atrocities of their Revolution would never have happened, and I believe it. Furious mobs are composed, not of enlightened but of unenlightened men—of men in whom the passions are dominant over the judgment, because the judgment had not been exercised, and informed, and habituated to direct the conduct. A factious declaimer can much less easily influence a number of men who acquired at school the rudiments of knowledge, and who have subsequently devoted their leisure to a Mechanics' Institute, than a multitude who cannot write or read, and who have never practised reasoning and considerate thought. And as the education of a people prevents political evil, it effects political good. Despotic rulers well know that knowledge is inimical to their power. This simple fact is a sufficient reason, to a good and wise man, to approve knowledge and extend it. The attention to public institutions and public measures which is inseparable from an educated population, is a great good. We all know that the human heart is such, that the possession of power is commonly attended with a desire to increase it, even in opposition to the general weal. It is acknowledged that a check is needed, and no check is either so efficient or so safe as that of a watchful and intelligent public mind ; so watchful, that it is prompt to discover and to expose what is amiss ; so intelligent, that it is able to form rational judgments respecting the nature and the means of amendment.

In all public institutions there exists, and it is happy that there does exist, a sort of vis inertie which habitually resists change. This, which is beneficial as a general tendency, is often injurious from its excess : the state of public institutions almost throughout the world, bears sufficient testimony to the truth, that they need alteration and amendment faster than they receive it—that the internal resistance of change is greater than is good for man. Unhappily, the ordinary way in which a people have endeavored to amend their institutions, has been by some mode of violence. If you ask when a nation acquired a greater degree of freedom, you are referred to some era of revolution and probably of blood. These are not proper, certainly they are not Christian, remedies for the disease. It is becoming an undisputed proposition, that no bad institution can permanently stand against the distinct opinion of a people. This opinion is likely to be universal, and to be intelligent only amongst an enlightened community. Now that reformation of public institutions which results from public opinion, is the very best in kind, and is likely to be the best in its mode :—in its kind, because public opinion is the proper measure of the needed alteration ; and in its mode, because alterations which result from such a cause, are likely to be temperately made.

It may be feared that some persons object to an extended education of the people on these very grounds which we propose as recommendations ; that they regard the tendency of education to produce examination, and, if need be, alteration of established institutions, as a reason for withholding it from the poor. To these, it is a sufficient answer, that if increase of knowledge and habits of investigation tend to alter any established institution, it is fit that it should be altered. There appears no means of avoiding this conclusion, unless it can be shown that increase of knowledge is usually attended with depravation of principle, and that in proportion as the judgment is exercised it decides amiss.

Generally, that intellectual education is good for a poor man which is good for his richer neighbors : in other words, that is good for the poor which is good for man. There may be exceptions to the general rule ; but he who is disposed to doubt the fitness of a rich man's education for the poor, will do well to consider first whether the rich man's education is fit for himself. The children of persons of property can undoubtedly learn much more than those of a laborer, and the laborer must select from the rich man's system a part only for his own child. But this does not affect the general conclusion. The parts which he ought to select are precisely those parts which are most necessary and beneficial to the rich.

Great as have been the improvements in the methods of conveying knowledge to the poor, there is reason to think that they will be yet greater. Some useful suggestions for the instruction of older children may I think be obtained from the systems in infant schools. In a well conducted infant school, children acquire much knowledge, and they acquire it with delight. This delight is of extreme importance : perhaps it may safely be concluded, respecting all innocent knowledge, that if a child acquired it with pleasure he is well taught. It is worthy observation, that in the infant system, lesson-learning is nearly or wholly excluded. It is not to be expected that in the time which is devoted professedly to education by the children of the poor, much extent of knowledge can be acquired ; but something may be acquired which is of much more consequence than mere school-learning—the love and the habits of enquiry. If education be so conducted that it is a positive pleasure to a boy to learn, there is little doubt that this love and habit will be induced. Here is the great advantage of early intellectual culture. The busiest have some leisure, leisure which they may employ ill or well; and that they will employ it well may reasonably be expected when knowledge is thus attractive for its own sake. That this effect is in a considerable degree actually produced, is indicated by the improved character of the books which poor men read, and in the prodigious increase in the number of those books. The supply and demand are correspondent. Almost every year produces books for the laboring classes of a higher intellectual order than the last. A journeyman in our days can understand and relish a work which would have been like Arabic to his grandfather.

Of moral education we say nothing here, except that the principles which are applicable to other classes of mankind are obviously applicable to the poor. With respect to the inculcation of peculiar religious opinions on the children who attend schools voluntarily supported, there is manifestly the same reason for inculcating them in this case as for teaching them at all. This supposes that the supporters of the school are not themselves divided in their religious opinions. If they are, and if the adherents to no one creed are able to support a school of their own, there appears no ground upon which they can rightly refuse to support a school in which no religious peculiarities are taught. It is better that intellectual knowledge, together with imperfect religious principles should be communicated, than that children should remain in darkness. There is indeed some reason to suspect the genuineness of that man's philanthropy, who refuses to impart any knowledge to his neighbors because he cannot, at the same time, teach them his own creed.

CHAPTER XII.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Stage—Religious Amusements—Masquerades—Field Sports—The Turf—Boxing—Wrestling—Opinions of Posterity—Popular Amusements needless.

It is a remarkable circumstance, that in almost all Christian countries many of the public and popular amusements have been regarded as objectionable by the more sober and conscientious part of the community. This opinion could scarcely have been general unless it had been just: yet why should a people prefer amusements of which good men feel themselves compelled to disapprove? Is it because no public recreation can be devised of which the evil is not greater than the good? or because the inclinations of most men are such, that if it were devised, they would not enjoy it? It may be feared that the desires which are seeking for gratification are not themselves pure; and pure pleasures are not congenial to impure minds. The real cause of the objectionable nature of many popular diversions is to be sought in the want of virtue in the people.

Amusement is confessedly a subordinate concern in life. It is neither the principal nor amongst the principal objects of proper solicitude. No reasonable man sacrifices the more important thing to the less, and that a man's religious and moral condition is of incomparably greater importance than his diversion, is sufficiently plain. In estimating the propriety or rather the lawfulness of a given amusement, it may safely be laid down, That none is lawful of which the aggregate consequences are injurious to morals:—nor, if its effects upon the immediate agents are, in general, morally bad:—nor if it occasions needless pain and misery to men or to animals:—nor, lastly, if it occupies much time or is attended with much expense.—Respecting all amusements, the question is not whether in their simple or theoretical character, they are defensible, but whether they are defensible in their actually existing state.

THE DRAMA.—So that if a person, by way of showing the propriety of theatrical exhibitions, should ask whether there was any harm in a man's repeating a composition before others and accompanying it with appropriate gestures—he would ask a very foolish question: because he would ask a question that possesses little or no relevancy to the subject.—What are the ordinary effects of the stage upon those who act on it? One and one only answer can be given—that whatever happy exceptions there may be, the effect is bad,—that the moral and religious character of actors is lower than that of persons in other professions. “It is an undeniable fact, for the truth of which we may safely appeal to every age and nation, that the situation of the performers, particularly of those of the female sex, is remarkably unfavorable to the maintenance and growth of the religious and moral principle, and of course highly dangerous to their eternal interests.”*

Therefore, if I take my seat in the theatre, I have paid three or five shillings as an inducement to a number of persons to subject their principles to extreme danger;—and the defence which I make is, that I am amused by it. Now, we affirm that this defence is invalid; that it is a defence which reason pronounces to be absurd, and morality to be vicious. Yet I have no other to make; it is the sum total of my justification.

But this, which is sufficient to decide the morality of the question, is not the only nor the chief part of the evil. The evil which is suffered by performers may be more intense, but upon spectators and others it is more extended. The night of a play is the harvest time of iniquity, where the profligate and the sensual put in their sickles and reap. It is to no purpose to say that a man may go to a theatre or parade a saloon without taking part in the surrounding licentiousness. All who are there promote the licentiousness, for if none were there, there would be no licentiousness; that is to say, if none purchased tickets there would be neither actors to be depraved nor dramas to vitiate, nor saloons to degrade and corrupt, and shock us.—The whole question of the lawfulness of the dramatic amusements, as they are ordinarily conducted, is resolved into a very simple thing:—After the doors on any given night are closed, have the virtuous or the vicious dispositions of the attenders been in the greater degree promoted? Every one knows that the balance is on the side of vice, and this conclusively decides the question—“Is it lawful to attend?”

* Wilberforce : Practical View, c. 4, s. 5.

The same question is to be asked, and the same answer I believe will be returned, respecting various other assemblies for purposes of amusement. They do more harm than good. They please but they injure us; and what makes the case still stronger is, that the pleasure is frequently such as ought not to be enjoyed. A tippler enjoys pleasure in becoming drunk, but he is not to allege the gratification as a set-off against the immorality. And so it is with no small portion of the pleasures of an assembly. Dispositions are gratified which it were wiser to thwart; and, to speak the truth, if the dispositions of the mind were such as they ought to be, many of these modes of diversion would be neither relished nor resorted to. Some persons try to persuade themselves that charity forms a part of their motive in attending such places ; as when the profits of the night are given to a benevolent institution. They hope, I suppose, that though it would not be quite right to go if benevolence were not a gainer, yet that the end warrants the means. But if these persons are charitable, let them give their guinea without deducting half for purposes of questionable propriety. Religious amusements, such as oratorios and the like, form one of those artifices of chicanery by which people cheat, or try to cheat, themselves. The music, say they, is sacred, is devotional ; and we go to hear it as we go to church : it excites and animates our religious sensibilities. This, in spite of the solemnity of the association, is really ludicrous. These scenes subserve religion no more than they subserve chemistry. They do not increase its power any more than the power of the steam-engine. As it respects Christianity, it is all imposition and fiction ; and it is unfortunate that some of the most solemn topics of our religion are brought into such unworthy and debasing alliance.*

MASQUERADES are of a more decided character. If the pleasure which people derive from meeting in disguises consisted merely in the "fun and drollery" of the thing, we might wonder to see so many children of five and six feet high, and leave them perhaps to their childishness :—but the truth is, that to many the zest of the concealment consists in the opportunity which it gives of covert licentiousness ; of doing that in secret, of which, openly, they would profess to be ashamed. Some men and some women who affect propriety when the face is shown, are glad of a few hours of concealed libertinism. It is a time in which principles are left to guard the citadel of virtue without the auxiliary of public opinion. And ill do they guard it ! It is no equivocal indication of the slender power of a person's principles, when they do not restrain him any longer than his misdeeds will produce exposure. She who is immodest at a masquerade, is modest nowhere. She may affect the language of delicacy and maintain external decorum, but she has no purity of mind.

* See also Essay II., c. I.

THE FIELD.—If we proceed with the calculation of the benefits and mischiefs of field-sports, in the merchant-like manner of debtor and creditor, the balance is presently found to be greatly against them. The advantages to him who rides after hounds and shoots pheasants, are—that he is amused, and possibly that his health is improved ; some of the disadvantages are—that it is unpropitious to the influence of religion and the dispositions which religion induces ; that it expends money and time which a man ought to be able to employ better ; and that it inflicts gratuitous misery upon the inferior animals. The value of the pleasure cannot easily be computed, and as to health it may pass for nothing ; for if a man is so little concerned for his health that he will not take exercise without dogs and guns, he has no reason to expect other men to concern themselves for it in remarking upon his actions. And then for the other side of the calculation. That field-sports have any tendency to make a man better, no one will pretend ; and no one who looks around him will doubt that their tendency is in the opposite direction. It is not necessary to show that every one who rides after the dogs is a worse man in the evening than he was in the morning : the influence of such things is to be sought in those with whom they are habitual. Is the character of the sportsman, then, distinguished by religious sensibility ? No. By activity of benevolence ? No. By intellectual exertion ? No. By purity of manners ? No.

Sportsmen are not the persons who diffuse the light of Christianity, or endeavor to rectify the public morals, or to extend the empire of knowledge. Look again at the clerical sportsman. Is he usually as exemplary in the discharge of his functions as those who decline such diversions? His parishioners know that he is not. So, then, the religious and moral tendency of field-sports is bad. It is not necessary to show how the ill effect is produced. It is sufficient that it actually is produced.

As to the expenditure of time and money, I dare say we shall be told that a man has a right to employ both as he chooses. We have heretofore seen that he has no such right. Obligations apply just as truly to the mode of employing leisure and property, as to the use which a man may make of a pound of arsenic. The obligations are not indeed alike enforced in a court of justice: the misuser of arsenic is carried to prison, the misuser of time and money awaits as sure an enquiry at another tribunal. But no folly is more absurd than that of supposing we have a right to do whatever the law does not punish. Such is the state of mankind, so great is the amount of misery and degradation, and so great are the effects of money and active philanthropy in meliorating this condition of our species, that it is no light thing for a man to employ his time and property upon vain and needless gratifications. It is no light thing to keep a pack of hounds, and to spend days and weeks in riding after them. As to the torture which field-sports inflict upon animals, it is wonderful to observe our inconsistencies. He who has, in the day, inflicted upon half a dozen animals almost as much torture as they are capable of sustaining, and who has wounded perhaps half a dozen more, and left them to die of pain or starvation, gives in the evening a grave reproof to his child, whom he sees amusing himself with picking off the wings of flies ! The infliction of pain is not that which gives pleasure to the sportsman, (this were ferocious depravity,) but he voluntarily inflicts the pain in order to please himself. Yet this man sighs and moralizes over the cruelty of children ! An appropriate device for a sportsman's dress would be a pair of balances, of which one scale was laden with "virtue and humanity," and the other with "sport;" the latter should be preponderating and lifting the other into the air.

THE TURF is still worse, partly because it is a stronghold of gambling, and therefore an efficient cause of misery and wickedness. It is an amusement of almost unmingled evil. But upon whom is the evil chargeable? Upon the fifty or one hundred persons only who bring horses and make bets? No; every man participates who attends the course. The great attraction of many public spectacles, and of this amongst others, consists more in the company than the ostensible object of amusement. Many go to a race-ground who cannot tell when they return what horse has been the victor. Every one therefore who is present must take his share of the mischief and the responsibility.

It is the same with respect to the gross and vulgar diversions of boxing, wrestling, and feats of running and riding. There is the same almost pure and unmingled evil—the same popularity resulting from the concourses who attend, and, by consequence, the participation and responsibility in those who do attend. The drunkenness, and the profaneness, and the debauchery, lie in part at the doors of those who are merely lookers-on; and if these lookers-on make pretensions to purity of character, their example is so much the more influential and their responsibility tenfold increased.

The vicissitudes of folly are endless: the vulgar games of the present day may soon be displaced by others, the same in genus, but differing in species. There is a grossness, a vulgarity, a want of mental elevation in these things, which might induce the man of intelligence to reprobate them even if the voice of morality were silent. They are remains of barbarism—evidences that barbarism still maintains itself amongst us—proofs that the higher qualities of our nature are not sufficiently dominant over the lower.

These grossnesses will pass away, as the deadly conflicts of men with beasts are passed already. Our posterity will wonder at the barbarism of us, their fathers, as we wonder at the barbarism of Rome. Let him, then, who loves intellectual elevation advance beyond the present times, and anticipate, in the recreations which he encourages, that period when these diversions shall be regarded as indicating one of the intermediate stages between the ferociousness of mental darkness and the purity of mental light.

---

These criticisms might be extended to many other species of amusement ; and it is humiliating to discover that the conclusion will very frequently be the same—that the evil outbalances the good, and that there are no grounds upon which a good man can justify a participation in them. In thus concluding, it is possible that the reader may imagine that we would exclude enjoyment from the world, and substitute a system of irreproachable austerity. He who thinks this is unacquainted with the nature and sources of our better enjoyments. It is an ordinary mistake to imagine that pleasure is great only when it is vivid or intemperate, as a child fancies it were more delightful to devour a pound of sugar at once, than to eat an ounce daily in his food. It is happily and kindly provided that the greatest sum of enjoyment is that which is quietly and constantly induced. No men understand the nature of pleasure so well, or possess it so much, as those who find it within their own doors. If it were not that moral education is so bad, multitudes would seek enjoyment and find it here, who now fancy that they never partake of pleasure except in scenes of diversion. It is unquestionably true that no community enjoys life more than that which excludes all these amusements from its sources of enjoyment. We use therefore the language, not of speculation, but of experience, when we say, that none of them is, in any degree, necessary to the happiness of life.

---

CHAPTER XIII.

SUICIDE.

Unmanliness of Suicide—Forbidden in the New Testament—Its folly.

THERE are few subjects upon which it is more difficult either to write or to legislate with effect, than that of suicide. It is difficult to a writer, because a man does not resolve upon the act until he has first become steeled to some of the most powerful motives that can be urged upon the human mind ; and to the legislator, because he can inflict no penalty upon the offending party.

It is to be feared that there is little probability of diminishing the frequency of this miserable offence by urging the considerations which philosophy suggests. The voice of nature is louder and stronger than the voice of philosophy : and as nature speaks to the suicide in vain, what is the hope that philosophy will be regarded?—There appears to be but one efficient means by which the mind can be armed against the temptations to suicide, because there is but one that can support it against every evil of life—practical religion—belief in the providence of God—confidence in his wisdom—hope in his goodness. The only anchor that can hold us in safety, is that which is fixed “within the veil.” He upon whom religion possesses its proper influence, finds that it enables him to endure, with resigned patience, every calamity of life. When patience thus fulfils its perfect work, suicide, which is the result of impatience, cannot be committed. He who is surrounded, by whatever means, with pain or misery, should remember that the present existence is strictly probationary—a scene upon which we are to be exercised, and tried, and tempted; and in which we are to manifest whether we are willing firmly to endure. The good or evil of the present life is of importance chiefly as it influences our allotment in futurity: sufferings are permitted for our advantage: they are designed to purify and rectify the heart. The universal Father “scourgeth every son whom he receiveth;” and the suffering, the scourging, is of little account in comparison with the prospects of another world. It is not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall follow—that glory of which an exceeding and eternal weight is the reward of a “patient continuance in well doing.” To him who thus regards misery, not as an evil but as a good; not as the unrestrained assault of chance or malice, but as the beneficent discipline of a Father; to him who remembers that the time is approaching in which he will be able most feelingly to say, “For all I bless Thee—most for the severe;”—every affliction is accompanied with its proper alleviation: the present hour may distress but it does not overwhelm him; he may be perplexed but is not in despair: he sees the darkness and feels the storm, but he knows that light will again arise, and that the storm will eventually be hushed with an efficacious, "Peace be still;" so that there shall be a great calm.

Compared with these motives to avoid the first promptings to suicide, others are like to be of little effect; and yet they are neither inconsiderable nor few. It is more dignified, more worthy an enlightened and manly understanding, to meet and endure an inevitable evil than to sink beneath it. He who feels prompted to suicide, sacrifices his life to his fears. The suicide balances between opposing objects of dread, (for dreadful self-destruction must be supposed to be,) and chooses the alternative which he fears least. If his courage, his firmness, his manliness, were greater, he who chooses the alternative of suicide, like him who chooses the duel, would endure the evil rather than avoid it in a manner which dignity and religion forbid. The lesson too which the self-destroyer teaches to his connections, of sinking in despair under the evils of life, is one of the most pernicious which a man can bequeath. The power of the example is also great. Every act of suicide tacitly conveys the sanction of one more judgment in its favor: frequency of repetition diminishes the sensation of abhorrence, and makes succeeding sufferers resort to it with less reluctance. "Besides which general reasons, each case will be aggravated by its own proper and particular consequences; by the duties that are deserted; by the claims that are defrauded; by the loss, affliction, or disgrace which our death, or the manner of it, causes our family, kindred, or friends; by the occasion we give to many to suspect the sincerity of our moral religious professions, and, together with ours, those of all others;"* and lastly, by the scandal which we bring upon religion itself by declaring, practically, that it is not able to support man under the calamities of life.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 4, c. 3.

Some men say that the New Testament contains no prohibition of suicide. If this were true, it would avail nothing, because there are many things which it does not forbid, but which every one knows to be wicked. But in reality it does forbid it. Every exhortation which it gives to be patient, every encouragement to trust in God, every consideration which it urges as a support under affliction and distress, is a virtual prohibition of suicide ;—because, if a man commits suicide, he rejects every such advice and encouragement, and disregards every such motive.

To him who believes either in revealed or natural religion, there is a certain folly in the commission of suicide : for from what does he fly ? From his present sufferings ; whilst death, for aught that he has reason to expect, or at any rate for aught that he knows, may only be the portal to sufferings more intense. Natural religion, I think, gives no countenance to the supposition that suicide can be approved by the Deity, because it proceeds upon the belief that, in another state of existence, he will compensate good men for the sufferings of the present. At the best, and under either religion, it is a desperate stake. He that commits murder may repent, and we hope, be forgiven ; but he that destroys himself, whilst he incurs a load of guilt, cuts off, by the act, the power of repentance.

Not every act of suicide is to be attributed to excess of misery. Some shoot themselves or throw themselves into a river in rage or revenge, in order to inflict pain and remorse upon those who have ill used them. Such, it is to be suspected, is sometimes a motive to self-destruction in disappointed love. The unhappy person leaves behind some message or letter, in the hope of exciting that affection and commiseration by the catastrophe, which he could not excite when alive. Perhaps such persons hope, too, that the world will sigh over their early fate, tell of the fidelity of their loves, and throw a romantic melancholy over their story. This needs not to be a subject of wonder: unnumbered multitudes have embraced death in other forms from kindred motives. We hear continually of those who die for the sake of glory. This is but another phantom, and the less amiable phantom of the two. It is just as reasonable to die in order that the world may admire our true love, as in order that it may admire our bravery. And the lover's hope is the better founded. There are too many aspirants for glory for each to get even his "peppercorn of praise." But the lover may hope for higher honors; a paragraph may record his fate through the existence of a weekly paper; he may be talked of through half a county; and some kindred spirit may inscribe a tributary sonnet in a lady's album.

---

CHAPTER XIV.

RIGHTS OF SELF-DEFENCE.

These rights not absolute — Their limits — Personal attack — Preservation of property — Much resistance lawful — Effects of forbearance — Sharpe — Barclay — Ellwood.

THE right of defending ourselves against violence is easily deducible from the law of nature. There is however little need to deduce it, because mankind are at least sufficiently persuaded of its lawfulness. — The great question, which the opinions and principles that now influence the world makes it needful to discuss is, whether the right of self-defence is absolute and unconditional—whether every action whatever is lawful, provided it is necessary to the preservation of life? They who maintain the affirmative, maintain a great deal; for they maintain that whenever life is endangered, all rules of morality are, as it respects the individual, suspended, annihilated: every moral obligation is taken away by the single fact that life is threatened.

Yet the language that is ordinarily held upon the subject implies the supposition of all this. “If our lives are threatened with assassination or open violence from the hands of robbers or enemies, any means of defence would be allowed, and laudable.”* Again, “There is one case in which all extremities are justifiable, namely, when our life is assaulted, and it becomes necessary for our preservation to kill the assailant.” †

The reader may the more willingly enquire whether these propositions are true, because most of those who lay them down are at little pains to prove their truth. Men are extremely willing to acquiesce in it without proof, and writers and speakers think it unnecessary to adduce it. Thus perhaps it happens that fallacy is not detected because it is not sought. — If the reader should think that some of the instances which follow are remote from the ordinary affairs of life, he is requested to remember that we are discussing the soundness of an alleged absolute rule. If it be found that there are or have been cases in which it is not absolute—cases in which all extremities are not lawful in defence of life—then the rule is not sound: then there are some limits to the right of self-defence.

If “any means of defence are laudable,” if “all extremities are justifiable,” then they are not confined to acts of resistance to the assailing party. There may be other conditions upon which life may be preserved than that of violence towards him. Some ruffians seize a man in the highway, and will kill him unless he will conduct them to his neighbor's property and assist them in carrying it off. May this man unite with them in the robbery in order to save his life, or may he not? If he may, what becomes of the law, Thou shalt not steal? If he may not, then not every means by which a man may preserve his life is "laudable" or "allowed." We have found an exception to the rule. There are twenty other wicked things which violent men may make the sole condition of not taking our lives. Do all wicked things become lawful because life is at stake? If they do, morality is surely at an end: if they do not, such propositions as those of Grotius and Paley are untrue.

* Grotius: Rights of War and Peace. † Paley: Mor. and Pol. Phil. p. 3, b. iv. c. 1.

A pagan has unalterably resolved to offer me up in sacrifice on the morrow, unless I will acknowledge the deity of his gods and worship them. I shall presume that the Christian will regard these acts as being, under every possible circumstance, unlawful. The night offers me an opportunity of assassinating him. Now I am placed, so far as the argument is concerned, in precisely the same situation with respect to this man, as a traveller is with respect to a ruffian with a pistol. Life in both cases depends on killing the offender. — Both are acts of self-defence. Am I at liberty to assassinate this man? The heart of the Christian surely answers, no. Here then is a case in which I may not take a violent man's life in order to save my own.—We have said that the heart of the Christian answers, no: and this we think is a just species of appeal. But if any one doubts whether the assassination would be unlawful, let him consider whether one of the Christian apostles would have committed it in such a case. Here, at any rate, the heart of every man answers, no. And mark the reason—because every man perceives that the act would have been palpably inconsistent with the apostolic character and conduct ; or, which is the same thing, with a Christian character and conduct.

Or put such a case in a somewhat different form. A furious Turk holds a scimitar over my head, and declares he will instantly dispatch me unless I abjure Christianity and acknowledge the divine legation of “the Prophet.” Now there are two supposable ways in which I may save my life ; one by contriving to stab the Turk, and one “by denying Christ before men.” You say I am not at liberty to deny Christ, but I am at liberty to stab the man. Why am I not at liberty to deny him ? Because Christianity forbids it. Then we require you to show that Christianity does not forbid you to take his life. Our religion pronounces both actions to be wrong. You say that, under these circumstances, the killing is right. Where is your proof ? What is the ground of your distinction ?—But, whether it can be adduced or not, our immediate argument is established—That there are some things which it is not lawful to do in order to preserve our lives.—This conclusion has indeed been practically acted upon. A company of inquisitors and their agents are about to conduct a good man to the stake. If he could by any means destroy these men, he might save his life. It is a question therefore of self-defence. Supposing these means to be within his power—supposing he could contrive a mine, and by suddenly firing it, blow his persecutors into the air—would it be lawful and Christian thus to act ? No. The common judgments of mankind respecting the right temper and conduct of the martyr, pronounce it to be wrong. It is pronounced to be wrong by the language and example of the first teachers of Christianity. The conclusion therefore again is that all extremities are not allowable in order to preserve life ;—that there is a limit to the right of self-defence.

It would be to no purpose to say that in some of the instances which have been proposed, religious duties interfere with and limit the rights of self-defence. This is a common fallacy. Religious duties and moral duties are identical in point of obligation, for they are imposed by one authority. Religious duties are not obligatory for any other reason than that which attaches to moral duties also ; namely the will of God. He who violates the moral law is as truly unfaithful in his allegiance to God, as he who denies Christ before men.

So that we come at last to one single and simple question, whether taking the life of a person who threatens ours, is or is not compatible with the moral law. We refer for an answer to the broad principles of Christian piety and Christian benevolence ; that piety which reposes habitual confidence in the Divine Providence, and an habitual preference of futurity to the present time ; and that benevolence which not only loves our neighbors as ourselves, but feels that the Samaritan or the enemy is a neighbor. There is no conjecture in life in which the exercise of this benevolence may be suspended ; none in which we are not required to maintain and to practise it. Whether want implores our compassion, or ingratitude returns ill for kindness ; whether a fellow creature is drowning in a river or assailing us on the highway ; everywhere, and under all circumstances, the duty remains.

Is killing an assailant, then, within or without the limits of this benevolence?—As to the man, it is evident that no good-will is exercised towards him by shooting him through the head. Who indeed will dispute that, before we can thus destroy him, benevolence towards him must be excluded from our minds? We not only exercise no benevolence ourselves, but preclude him from receiving it from any human heart; and, which is a serious item in the account, we cut him off from all possibility of reformation. To call sinners to repentance, was one of the great characteristics of the mission of Christ. Does it appear consistent with this characteristic for one of His followers to take away from a sinner the power of repentance? Is it an act that accords, and is congruous, with Christian love?

But an argument has been attempted here. That we may "kill the assailant is evident in a state of nature, unless it can be shown that we are bound to prefer the aggressor's life to our own; that is to say, to love our enemy better than ourselves, which can never be a debt of justice, nor any where appears to be a duty of charity."* The answer is this: That although we may not be required to love our enemy better than ourselves, we are required to love him as ourselves; and therefore, in the supposed case, it would still be a question equally balanced which life ought to be sacrificed; for it is quite clear that, if we kill the assailant, we love him less than ourselves, which does seem to militate against a duty of charity. But the truth is that he who, from motives of obedience to the will of God, spares the aggressor's life even to the endangering his own, does exercise love both to the aggressor and to himself, perfectly: to the aggressor, because by sparing his life we give him the opportunity of repentance and amendment: to himself, because every act of obedience to God is perfect benevolence towards ourselves; it is consulting and promoting our most valuable interests; it is propitiating the favor of Him who is emphatically "a rich rewarder."—So that the question remains as before, not whether we should love our enemy better than ourselves, but whether Christian principles are acted upon in destroying him : and if they are not, whether we should prefer Christianity to ourselves ; whether we should be willing to lose our life for Christ's sake and the gospel's.

* Paley: Mor. and Pol. Phil. p. 3, b. 4. c. 1.

Perhaps it will be said that he should exercise benevolence to the public as well as to the offender, and that we may exercise more benevolence to them by killing than by sparing him. But very few persons, when they kill a man who attacks them, kill him out of benevolence to the public. That is not the motive which influences their conduct, or which they at all take into the account. Besides, it is by no means certain that the public would lose anything by the forbearance. To be sure, a man can do no more mischief after he is killed ; but then it is to be remembered, that robbers are more desperate and more murderous from the apprehension of swords and pistols than they would be without it. Men are desperate in proportion to their apprehensions of danger. The plunderer who feels a confidence that his own life will not be taken, may conduct his plunder with comparative gentleness ; whilst he who knows that his life is in immediate jeopardy, stuns or murders his victim lest he should be killed himself. The great evil which a family sustains by a robbery is often not the loss, but the terror and the danger ; and these are the evils which, by the exercise of forbearance, would be diminished. So that, if some bad men are prevented from committing robberies by the fear of death, the public gains in other ways by the forbearance : nor is it by any means certain that the balance of advantages is in favor of the more violent course.—The argument which we are opposing proceeds on the supposition that our own lives are endangered. Now it is a fact that this very danger results, in part, from the want of habits of forbearance.

We publicly profess that we would kill an assailant ; and the assailant, knowing this, prepares to kill us when otherwise he would forbear.

And after all, if it were granted that a person is at liberty to take an assailant's life in order to preserve his own, how is he to know, in the majority of instances, whether his own would be taken? When a man breaks into a person's house and this person, as soon as he comes up with the robber, takes out a pistol and shoots him, we are not to be told that this man was killed "in defence of life." Or go a step further, and a step further still, by which the intention of the robber to commit personal violence or inflict death is more and more probable :—You must at last shoot him in uncertainty whether your life was endangered or not. Besides, you can withdraw—you can fly. None but the predetermined murderer wishes to commit murder. But perhaps you exclaim—"Fly ! fly, and leave your property, unprotected !" Yes—unless you mean to say that preservation of property, as well as preservation of life, makes it lawful to kill an offender. This were to adopt a new and a very different proposition ; but a proposition which I suspect cannot be separated in practice from the former. He who affirms that he may kill another in order to preserve his life, and that he may endanger his life in order to protect his property, does in reality affirm that he may kill another in order to preserve his property. But such a proposition, in an unconditional form, no one surely will tolerate. The laws of the land do not admit it, nor do they even admit the right of taking another's life simply because he is attempting to take ours. They require that we should be tender even of the murderer's life, and that we should fly rather than destroy it.*

We say that the proposition that we may take life in order to preserve our property is intolerable. To preserve how much? five hundred pounds, or fifty, or ten, or a shilling or a sixpence? It has actually been declared that the rights of self-defence "justify a man in taking all forcible methods which are necessary, in order to procure the restitution of the freedom or the property of which he had been unjustly deprived."* All forcible methods to obtain restitution of property! No limit to the nature or effects of the force! No limit to the insignificance of the amount of the property! Apply, then, the rule. A boy snatches a bunch of grapes from a fruiterer's stall. The fruiterer runs after the thief, but finds that he is too light of foot to be overtaken. Moreover, the boy eats as he runs. "All forcible methods," reasons the fruiterer, "are justifiable to obtain restitution of property. I may fire after the plunderer, and when he falls regain my grapes." All this is just and right, if Gisborne's proposition is true. It is a dangerous thing to lay down maxims in morality.

* Blackstone : Com. v. 4, c. 4.

The conclusion, then, to which we are led by these enquiries is, that he who kills another, even upon the plea of self-defence, does not do it in the predominance nor in the exercise of Christian dispositions: and if this is true, is it not also true, that his life cannot be thus taken in conformity with the Christian law?

But this is very far from concluding that no resistance may be made to aggression. We may make, and we ought to make, a great deal. It is the duty of the civil magistrate to repress the violence of one man towards another, and by consequence it is the duty of the individual, when the civil power cannot operate, to endeavor to repress it himself. I perceive no reasonable exception to the rule—that whatever Christianity permits the magistrate to do in order to restrain violence, it permits the individual, under such circumstances to do also. I know the consequences to which this rule leads in the case of the punishment of death, and of other questions. These questions will hereafter be discussed. In the mean time, it may be an act of candor to the reader to acknowledge, that our chief motive for the discussions of the present chapter, has been to pioneer the way for a satisfactory investigation of the punishment of death, and of other modes by which human life is taken away.

* Gisborne: Moral Philosophy.

Many kinds of resistance to aggression come strictly within the fulfilment of the law of benevolence. He who, by securing a man, prevents him from committing an act of great turpitude, is certainly his benefactor; and if he be thus reserved for justice, the benevolence is great both to him and to the public. It is an act of much kindness to a bad man to secure him for the penalties of the law: or it would be such, if penal law were in the state in which it ought to be, and to which it appears to be making some approaches. It would then be very probable that the man would be reformed: and this is the greatest benefit which can be conferred upon him and upon the community.

The exercise of Christian forbearance towards violent men is not tantamount to an invitation of outrage. Cowardice is one thing; this forbearance is another. The man of true forbearance is of all men the least cowardly. It requires courage in a greater degree and of a higher order to practice it when life is threatened, than to draw a sword or fire a pistol.—No: It is the peculiar privilege of Christian virtue to approve itself even to the bad. There is something in the nature of that calmness, and self-possession, and forbearance, that religion effects, which obtains, nay which almost commands regard and respect. How different the effect upon the violent tenants of Newgate, the hardihood of a turnkey and the mild courage of an Elizabeth Fry ! Experience, incontestable experience, has proved, that the minds of few men are so depraved or desperate as to prevent them from being influenced by real Christian conduct. Let him therefore who advocates the taking the life of an aggressor, first show that all other means of safety are vain ; let him show that bad men, notwithstanding the exercise of true Christian forbearance, persist in their purposes of death : when he has done this he will have adduced an argument in favor of taking their lives which will not indeed be conclusive, but which will approach nearer to conclusiveness than any that has yet been adduced.

Of the consequences of forbearance, even in the case of personal attack, there are some examples : Archbishop Sharpe was assaulted by a footpad on the highway, who presented a pistol and demanded his money. The Archbishop spoke to the robber in the language of a fellow man and of a Christian. The man was really in distress, and the prelate gave him such money as he had, and promised that, if he would call at the palace, he would make up the amount to fifty pounds. This was the sum of which the robber had said he stood in the utmost need. The man called and received the money. About a year and a half afterwards, this man again came to the palace and brought back the same sum. He said that his circumstances had become improved and that, through the "astonishing goodness" of the Archbishop, he had become "the most penitent, the most grateful, and happiest of his species."—Let the reader consider how different the Archbishop's feelings were, from what they would have been if, by his hand this man had been cut off.*

* See Lond. Chron. "Aug. 12, 1785." See also life of Granville Sharpe, Esq., p. 13.

Barclay, the Apologist, was attacked by a highwayman. He substituted for the ordinary modes of resistance, a calm expostulation. The felon dropped his presented pistol, and offered no further violence. A Leonard Fell was similarly attacked, and from him the robber took both his money and his horse, and then threatened to blow out his brains. Fell solemnly spoke to the man on the wickedness of his life. The robber was astonished : he had expected, perhaps, curses, or perhaps a dagger. He declared he would not keep either the horse or the money, and returned both. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him ; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head."*—The tenor of the short narrative that follows is somewhat different. Ellwood, who is known to the literary world as the suggester to Milton of Paradise Regained, was attending his father in his coach. Two men waylaid them in the dark and stopped the carriage. Young Ellwood got out, and on going up to the nearest, the ruffian raised a heavy club, "when," says Ellwood, "I whipped out my rapier and made a pass upon him. I could not have failed running him through up to the hilt," but the sudden appearance of the bright blade terrified the man so that he stepped aside, avoided the thrust, and both he and the other fled. "At that time," proceeds Ellwood, "and for a good while after, I had no regret upon my mind for what I had done." This was whilst he was young, and when the forbearing principles of Christianity had little influence upon him. But afterwards, when this influence became powerful, "a sort of horror," he says, "seized on me when I considered how near I had been to the staining of my hands with human blood. And whensoever afterwards I went that way, and indeed as often since as the matter has come into my remembrance, my soul has blessed Him who preserved and withheld me from shedding man's blood.' '*

* "Select Anecdotes, &c." by John Barclay.

That those over whom, as over Ellwood, the influence of Christianity is imperfect and weak, should think themselves at liberty upon such occasions to take the lives of their fellow-men, needs to be no subject of wonder. Christianity, if we would rightly estimate its obligations, must be felt in the heart. They in whose hearts it is not felt, or felt but little, cannot be expected perfectly to know what its obligations are. I know not therefore that more appropriate advice can be given to him who contends for the lawfulness of taking another man's life in order to save his own, than that he would first enquire whether the influence of religion is dominant in his mind. If it is not, let him suspend his decision until he has attained to the fulness of the stature of a Christian man. Then, as he will be of that number who do the will of Heaven, he may hope to "know of this doctrine whether it be of God."

* Ellwood's Life.

ESSAY III.*

POLITICAL RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS.

---

CHAPTER I.

PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL TRUTH, AND OF POLITICAL RECTITUDE.

- I.—“Political Power is rightly exercised only when it is possessed by consent of the community”—Governors Officers of the public—Transfer of their rights by a whole people—The people hold the sovereign power—Rights of Governors—A conciliating system.
- II.—“Political Power is rightly exercised only when it subserves the welfare of the community”—Interference with other nations—Present expedients for present occasions—Proper business of Governments.
- III.—“Political Power is rightly exercised only when it subserves the welfare of the community by means which the moral law permits”—The moral law alike binding on nations and individuals—Deviation from rectitude impolitic.

[* This Essay the author did not live to revise, a circumstance which will account for a want of complete connection of the different parts of a subject which the reader will sometimes meet with. There occur also in this part of the manuscript numerous memoranda, which the author intended to make use of in a future revision. These are to be distinguished from the Notes, as the former refer, not to any particular passage but only to the subject of the chapter or section. They were hastily, as the thought occurred, written in the margin or on a blank leaf of the manuscript, and they are here introduced at the bottom of the page, in those parts to which they appear to have the nearest reference.—ED.]

THE fundamental principles which are deducible from the law of nature and from Christianity, respecting political affairs, appear to be these :—

1. Political Power is rightly possessed only when it is possessed by consent of the community ;—

2. It is rightly exercised only when it subserves the welfare of the community ;—

3. And only when it subserves this purpose, by means which the moral law permits.

I—“POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY POSSESSED ONLY WHEN IT IS POSSESSED BY CONSENT OF THE COMMUNITY.”

Perfect liberty is desirable if it were consistent with the greatest degree of happiness. But it is not. Men find that, by giving up a part of their liberty, they are more happy than by retaining, or attempting to retain, the whole. Government, whatever be its form, is the agent by which the inexpedient portion of individual liberty is taken away. Men institute government for their own advantage, and because they find they are more happy with it than without it. This is the sole reason, in principle, how little soever it be adverted to in practice. Governors, therefore, are the officers of the public, in the proper sense of the word : not the slaves of the public ; for if they do not incline to conform to the public will, they are at liberty, like other officers, to give up their office. They are servants, in the same manner, and for the same purpose, as a solicitor is the servant of his client, and the physician of his patient. These are employed by the patient or the client voluntarily for his own advantage, and for nothing else. A nation, (not an individual, but a nation,) is under no other obligation to obedience, than that which arises from the conviction that obedience is good for itself :—or rather, in more proper language, a nation is under no obligation to obedience at all. Obedience is voluntary. If they do not think it proper to obey—that is, if they are not satisfied with their officers—they are at liberty to discontinue their obedience, and to appoint other officers instead.

It is incidental to the office of the first public servants, that they should exercise authority over those by whom they are selected ; and hence probably, it has happened that the terms “public officer,” “public servant,” have excited such strange controversies in the world. Men have not maintained sufficient discrimination of ideas. Seeing that governors are great and authoritative, a man imagines it cannot be proper to say they are servants. Seeing that it is necessary and right that individuals should obey, he cannot entertain the notion that they are the servants of those whom they govern. The truth is, that governors are not the servants of individuals but of the community. They are the masters of individuals, the servants of the public ; and if this simple distinction had been sufficiently borne in mind, much perhaps of the vehement contention upon these matters had been avoided.

But the idea of being a servant to the public, is quite consistent with the idea of exercising authority over them. The common language of a patient is founded upon similar grounds. He sends for a physician :—the physician comes at his desire—is paid for his services—and then the patient says, I am ordered to adopt a regimen, I am ordered to Italy ;—and he obeys, not because he may not refuse to obey if he chooses, but because he confides in the judgment of the physician, and thinks that it is more to his benefit to be guided by the physician’s judgment than by his own. But it will be said the physician cannot enforce his orders upon the patient against his will : neither I answer can the governor enforce his upon the public against theirs. No doubt governors do sometimes so enforce them. What they do, however, and what they rightfully do, are separate considerations, and our business is only with the latter.

The rule that "political power is rightly possessed only when it is possessed by consent of the community;" necessarily applies to the choice of the person who is to exercise it. No man, and no set of men, rightly govern unless they are preferred by the public to others. It is of no consequence that a people should formally select a president or a king. They continually act upon the principle without this. A people who are satisfied with their governor make, day by day, the choice of which we speak. They prefer him to all others; they choose to be served by him rather than by any other; and he, therefore, is virtually, though not formally, selected by the public. But, when we speak of the right of a particular person or family to govern a people, we speak, as of all other rights, in conditional language. The right consists in the preference which is given to him; and exists no longer than that preference exists. If any governor were fully conscious that the community preferred another man or another kind of government, he ought to regard himself in the light of an usurper if he nevertheless continues to retain his power. Not that every government ought to dissolve itself, or every governor to abdicate his office, because there is a general but temporary clamor against it. This is one thing—the steady deliberate judgment of the people is another. Is it too much to hope that the time may come when governments will so habitually refer to the purposes of government, and be regulated by them, that they will not even wish to hold the reins longer than the people desire it; and that nothing more will be needed for a quiet alteration than that the public judgment should be quietly expressed?

Political revolutions are not often favorable to the accurate illustration of political truth ; because, such is the moral condition of mankind, that they have seldom acted in conformity with it. Revolutions have commonly been the effect of the triumph of a party, or of the successes of physical power. Yet, if the illustration of these principles has not been accurate, the general position of the right of the people to select their own rulers has often been illustrated. In England, when James II. left the throne, the people filled it with another person, whose real title consisted in the choice of the people. James continued to talk of his rights to the crown ; but if William was preferred by the public, James was, what his son was afterwards called, a pretender. The nonjurors appear to have acted upon erroneous principles, (except indeed on the score of former oaths to James ; which, however, ought never to have been taken.) If we acquit them of motives of party, they will appear to have entertained some notions of the rights of governors independently of the wishes of the people. At William's death, the nation preferred James's daughter to his son ; thus again elevating their judgments above all considerations of what the pretender called his rights. Anne had then a right to the throne, and her brother had not. At the death of Anne, or rather in contemplation of her death, the public had again to select their governor ; and they chose, not the immediate representative of the old family, but the elector of Hanover : and it is in virtue of the same choice, tacitly expressed at the present hour, that the heir of the elector now fills the throne.

[The habitual consciousness on the part of a legislature, that its authority is possessed in order to make it an efficient guardian and promoter of the general welfare and the general satisfaction, would induce a more mild and conciliating system of internal policy than that which frequently obtains. Whether it has arisen from habit resulting from the violent and imperious character of international policy, or from that tendency to unkindness and overbearing which the consciousness of power induces, it cannot be doubted that measures of government are frequently adopted and conducted with such a high hand as impairs the satisfaction of the governed, and diminishes, by example, that considerate attention to the claims of others, upon which much of the harmony, and therefore the happiness of society consists. Governments are too much afraid of conciliation. They too habitually suppose that mildness or concession indicates want of courage or want of power—that it invites unreasonable demands, and encourages encroachment and violence on the part of the governed. Man is not so intractable a being, or so insensible of the influence of candor and justice. In private life, he does not the most easily guide the conduct of his neighbors, who assumes an imperious, but he who assumes a temperate and mild demeanor. The best mode of governing, and the most powerful mode too, is to recommend state measures to the judgment and the affections of a people. If this had been sufficiently done in periods of tranquillity, some of those conflicts which have arisen between governments and the people had doubtless been prevented; and governments had been spared the mortification of conceding that to violence which they refused to concede in periods of quiet. We should not wait for times of agitation to do that which Fox advised even at such a time, because at other periods it may be done with greater advantage and with a better grace. “It may be asked,” said Fox, “what I would propose to do in times of agitation like the present? I will answer openly:—If there is a tendency in the Dissenters to discontent, what should I do? I would instantly repeal the corporation and test acts, and take from them thereby all cause of complaint. If there were any persons tinctured with a republican spirit, I would endeavor to amend the representation of the Commons, and to prove that the House of Commons, though not chosen by all, should have no other interest than to prove itself the representative of all. If men were dissatisfied on account of disabilities or exemptions, &c., I would repeal the penal statutes, which are a disgrace to our law-books. If there were other complaints of grievance, I would redress them where they were really proved; but, above all, I would constantly, cheerfully, patiently listen; I would make it known, that if any man felt, or thought he felt a grievance, he might come freely to the bar of this House and bring his proofs. And it should be made manifest to all the world that where they did exist they should be redressed; where not, it should be made manifest.”*

We need not consider the particular examples and measures which the statesman instanced. The temper and spirit is the thing. A government should do that of which every person would see the propriety in a private man; if misconduct was charged upon him, show that the charge was unfounded; or, being substantiated, amend his conduct.]

---

II.—“POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY EXERCISED ONLY WHEN IT SUBSERVES THE WELFARE OF THE COMMUNITY.”

This proposition is consequent of the truth of the last. The community, which has the right to withhold power, delegates it, of course, for its own advantage. If in any case its advantage is not consulted, then the object for which it was delegated is frustrated ; or, in simple words, the measure which does not promote the public welfare is not right. It matters nothing whether the community have delegated specifically so much power for such and such purposes ; the power, being possessed, entails the obligation. Whether a sovereign derives absolute authority by inheritance, or whether a president is entrusted with limited authority for a year, the principles of their duty are the same. The obligation to employ it only for the public good, is just as real and just as great in one case as in the other. The Russian and the Turk have the same right to require that the power of their rulers shall be so employed as the Englishman or American. They may not be able to assert this right, but that does not affect its existence nor the ruler's duty, nor his responsibility to that Almighty Being before whom he must give an account of his stewardship. These reasonings, if they needed confirmation derive it from the fact that the Deity imperatively requires us, according to our opportunities, to do good to man.

* Fell's Memoirs of the Public Life of C. J. Fox.

Governments commonly trouble themselves unnecessarily and too much with the politics of other nations. A prince should turn his back towards other countries and his face towards his own—just as the proper place of a landholder is upon his own estates and not upon his neighbor's. If governments were wise, it would ere long be found that a great portion of the endless and wearisome succession of treaties and remonstrances, and embassies, and alliances, and memorials, and subsidies, might be dispensed with, with so little inconvenience and so much benefit, that the world would wonder to think to what futile ends they had been busying and how needlessly they had been injuring themselves.

No doubt, the immoral and irrational system of international politics which generally obtains, makes the path of one government more difficult than it would otherwise be ; and yet it is probable that the most efficacious way of inducing another government to attend to its proper business, would be to attend to our own. It is not sufficiently considered, nor indeed is it sufficiently known, how powerful is the influence of uprightness and candor in conciliating the good opinion and the good offices of other men. Overreaching and chicanery in one person, induce overreaching and chicanery in another. Men distrust those whom they perceive to be unworthy of confidence. Real integrity is not without its voucher in the hearts of others ; and they who maintain it are treated with confidence, because it is seen that confidence can be safely reposed. Besides, he who busies himself with the politics of foreign countries, like the busybodies in a petty community, does not fail to offend. In the last century, our own country was so much of a busybody, and had involved itself in such a multitude of treaties and alliances, that it was found, I believe, quite impossible to fulfil one, without, by that very act, violating another. This, of course, would offend. In private life, that man passes through the world with the least annoyance and the greatest satisfaction, who confines his attention to its proper business, that is, generally, to his own : and who can tell why the experience of nations should in this case be different from that of private men ? In a rectified state of international affairs, half a dozen princes on a continent would have little more occasion to meddle with one another than half a dozen neighbors in a street.

But indeed, communities frequently contribute to their own injury. If governors are ambitious, or resentful, or proud, so, often, are the people ;—and the public good has often been sacrificed by the public, with astonishing preposterousness, to jealousy or vexation. Some merchants are angry at the loss of a branch of trade ; they urge the government to interfere ; memorials and remonstrances follow to the state of whom they complain ;—and so, by that process of exasperation which is quite natural when people think that high language and a high attitude is politic, the nations soon begin to fight. The merchants applaud the spirit of their rulers, while in one year they lose more by the war than they would have lost by the want of the trade for twenty ; and before peace returns, the nation has lost more than it would have lost by the continuance of the evil for twenty centuries. Peace at length arrives, and the government begins to devise means of repairing the mischiefs of the war. Both government and people reflect very complacently on the wisdom of their measures—forgetting that their conduct is only that of a man who wantonly fractures his own leg with a club, and then boasts to his neighbors how dexterously he limps to a surgeon.

We know what a sickening detail the history of Europe is ; and it is obvious to remark, that the system which has given rise to such a history must be vicious and mistaken in its fundamental principles. The same class of history will continue to after generations unless these principles are changed—unless philosophy and Christianity obtain a greater influence in the practice of government ; unless, in a word, governments are content to do their proper business, and to leave that which is not their business undone.

When such principles are acted upon, we may reasonably expect a rapid advancement in the whole condition of the world. Domestic measures which are now postponed to the more stirring occupations of legislators, will be found to be of incomparably greater importance than they. A wise code of criminal law, will be found to be of more consequence and interest than the acquisition of a million square miles of territory :—a judicious encouragement of general education, will be of more value than all the “glory” that has been acquired from the days of Alfred till now. Of moral legislation, however, it will be our after business to speak ; meanwhile the lover of mankind has some reason for gratulation, in perceiving indications that governments will hereafter direct their attention more to the objects for which they are invested with power. The statesman who promotes this improvement will be what many statesman have been called—a great man. That government only is great which promotes the prosperity of its own people ; and that people only are prosperous, who are wise and happy.

---

III.—“POLITICAL POWER IS RIGHTLY EXERCISED ONLY WHEN IT SUBSERVES THE WELFARE OF THE COMMUNITY BY MEANS WHICH THE MORAL LAW PERMITS.”

It has been said by a Christian writer, that “the science of politics is but a particular application of that of morals ;” and it has been said by a writer who rejected Chistianity, that “the morality that ought to govern the conduct of individuals and of nations, is in all cases the same.” If there be truth in the principles which are advanced in the first of these essays, these propositions are indisputably true. It is the chief purpose of the present work to enforce the supremacy of the moral law ; and to this supremacy there is no exception in the case of nations. In the conduct of nations this supremacy is practically denied, although, perhaps, few of those who make it subservient to other purposes would deny it in terms. With their lips they honor the doctrine, but in their works they deny it. Such procedures must be expected to produce much self-contradiction, much vacillation between truth and the wish to disregard it, much vagueness of notions respecting political rectitude, and much casuistry to educe something like a justification of what cannot be justified. Let the reader observe an illustration:—A moral philosopher says, “The Christian principles of love, and forbearance, and kindness, strictly as they are to be observed between man and man, are to be observed with precisely the same strictness between nation and nation.” This is an unqualified assertion of the truth. But the writer thinks it would carry him too far, and so he makes exceptions. “In reducing to practice the Christian principles of forbearance, &c., it will not be always feasible, nor always safe, to proceed to the same extent as in acting towards an individual.” Let the reader exercise his skill in casuistry, by showing the difference between conforming to laws with “precise strictness,” and conforming to them in their “full extent.”—Thus far Christianity and expediency are proposed as our joint governors.—We must observe the moral law, but still we must regulate our observance of it by considerations of what is feasible and safe. Presently afterwards, however, Christianity is quite dethroned, and we are to observe its laws only “so far as national ability and national security will permit.”*—So that our rule of political conduct stands at length thus: obey Christianity with precise strictness—when it suits your interests.

The reasoning by which such doctrines are supported, is such as it might be expected to be. We are told of the “caution requisite in affairs of such magnitude—the great uncertainty of the future conduct of the other nation”—and of “patriotism.”—So that, because the affairs are of great magnitude, the laws of the Deity are not to be observed ! It is all very well, it seems, to observe them in little matters, but for our more important concerns we want rules commensurate with their dignity—we cannot then be bound by the laws of God ! The next reason is, that we cannot foresee “ the future conduct ” of a nation.—Neither can we that of an individual. Besides this, inability to foresee inculcates the very lesson that we ought to observe the laws of Him who can foresee. It is a strange thing to urge the limitation of our powers of judgment, as a reason for substituting it for the judgment of Him whose powers are perfect. Then “ patriotism ” is a reason : and we are to be patriotic to our country at the expense of treason to our religion !

* Gisborne's Moral Philosophy.

The principles upon which these reasonings are founded, lead to their legitimate results : “ In war and negotiation,” says Adam Smith, “ the laws of justice are very seldom observed. Truth and fair dealing are almost totally disregarded. Treaties are violated, and the violation, if some advantage is gained by it, sheds scarce any dishonor upon the violator. The ambassador who dupes the minister of a foreign nation, is admired and applauded. The just man, the man who in all private transactions would be the most beloved and the most esteemed, in those public transactions is regarded as a fool and an idiot, who does not understand his business ; and he incurs always the contempt, and sometimes even the detestation, of his fellow citizens.”*

Now, against all such principles—against all endeavors to defend the rejection of the moral law in political affairs, we would with all emphasis protest. The reader sees that it is absurd :—can he need to be convinced that it is unchristian ? Christianity is of paramount authority, or another authority is superior. He who holds another authority as superior, rejects Christianity ; and the fair and candid step would be avowedly to reject it. He should say, in distinct terms—Christianity throws some light on political principles ; but its laws are to be held subservient to our interests. This were far more satisfactory than the trimming system, the perpetual vacillation of obedience to two masters, and the perpetual endeavor to do that which never can be done—serve both.

* Theory of Moral Sentiments.

Jesus Christ legislated for man—not for individuals only, not for families only, not for Christian churches only, but for man in all his relationships and in all his circumstances. He legislated for states. In his moral law we discover no indications that states were exempted from its application, or that any rule which bound social did not bind political communities. If any exemption were designed, the onus probandi rests upon those who assert it : unless they can show that the Christian precepts are not intended to apply to nations, the conclusion must be admitted that they are. But in reality, to except nations from the obligations is impossible ; for nations are composed of individuals, and if no individual may reject the Christian morality, a nation may not. Unless, indeed, it can be shown that when you are an agent for others you may do what neither yourself nor any of them might do separately—a proposition of which certainly the proof must be required to be very clear and strong.

But the truth is, that those who justify a suspension of Christian morality in political affairs, are often unwilling to reason distinctly and candidly upon the subject. They satisfy themselves with a jest, or a sneer, or a shrug ; being unwilling either to condemn morality in politics, or to practise it : and it is to little purpose to offer arguments to him who does not need conviction, but virtue.

Expediency is the rock upon which we split—upon which, strange as it appears, not only our principles but our interests suffer continual shipwreck. It has been upon expediency that European politics have so long been founded, with such lamentably inexpedient effects. We consult our interests so anxiously that we ruin them. But we consult them blindly: we do not know our interests, nor shall we ever know them whilst we continue to imagine that we know them better than he who legislated for the world. Here is the perpetual folly as well as the perpetual crime. Esteeming ourselves wise, we have, emphatically, been fools—of which no other evidence is necessary than the present political condition of the Christian world. If ever it was true of any human being, that by his deviations from rectitude he had provided scourges for himself, it is true at this hour of every nation in Europe.

Let us attend to this declaration of a man who, whatever may have been the value of his general politics, was certainly a great statesman here: “I am one of those who firmly believe, as much indeed as a man can believe anything, that the greatest resource a nation can possess, the surest principle of power, is strict attention to the principles of justice. I firmly believe that the common proverb of honesty being the best policy, is as applicable to nations as to individuals.”—“In all interference with foreign nations justice is the best foundation of policy, and moderation is the surest pledge of peace.”—“If therefore we have been deficient in justice towards other states, we have been deficient in wisdom.”*

Here, then, is the great truth for which we would contend—to be unjust is to be unwise. And since justice is not imposed upon nations more really than other branches of the moral law, the universal maxim is equally true—to deviate from purity of rectitude is impolitic as well as wrong. When will this truth be learnt and be acted upon? When shall we cast away the contrivances of a low and unworthy policy and dare the venture of the consequences of virtue? When shall we, in political affairs, exercise a little of that confidence in the knowledge and protection of God, which we are ready to admire in individual life?—Not that it is to be assumed as certain that such fidelity would cost nothing. Christianity makes no such promise. But whatever it might cost it would be worth the purchase. And neither reason nor experience allows the doubt that a faithful adherence to the moral law would more effectually serve national interests, than they have ever yet been served by the utmost sagacity whilst violating that law.

* Fell's Memoirs of the Public Life of C. J. Fox.

The contrivances of expediency have become so habitual to measures of state, that it may probably be thought the dreamings of a visionary to suppose it possible that they should be substituted by purity of rectitude. And yet I believe it will eventually be done—not perhaps by the resolution of a few cabinets—it is not from them that reformation is to be expected—but by the gradual advance of sound principles upon the minds of men—principles which will assume more and more their rightful influence in the world, until at length the low contrivances of a fluctuating and immoral policy will be substituted by firm, and consistent, and invariable integrity.

CHAPTER II.

CIVIL LIBERTY.

Loss of Liberty—War—Useless laws.

OF personal liberty we say nothing, because its full possession is incompatible with the existence of society. All government supposes the relinquishment of a portion of personal liberty.

Civil liberty may, however, be fully enjoyed. It is enjoyed, where the principles of political truth and rectitude are applied in practice, because there the people are deprived of that portion only of liberty which it would be pernicious to themselves to possess. If political power is possessed by consent of the community ; if it is exercised only for their good ; and if this welfare is consulted by Christian means, the people are free. No man can divine the particular enjoyments or exemptions which constitute civil liberty, because they are contingent upon the circumstances of the respective nations. A degree of restraint may be necessary for the general welfare of one community, which would be wholly unnecessary in another. Yet the first would have no reason to complain of their want of civil liberty. The complaint, if any be made, should be of the evils which make the restraint necessary. The single question is, whether any given degree of restraint is necessary or not. If it is, though the restraint may be painful, the civil liberty of the community may be said to be complete. It is useless to say that it is less complete than that of another nation ; for complete civil liberty is a relative and not a positive enjoyment. Were it otherwise, no people enjoy, or are likely for ages to enjoy full civil liberty ; because none enjoy so much that they could not, in a more virtuous state of mankind, enjoy more. "It is not the rigor, but the inexpediency of laws and acts of authority, which makes them tyrannical.”*

Civil liberty (so far as its present enjoyment goes) does not necessarily depend upon forms of government. All communities enjoy it who are properly governed. It may be enjoyed under an absolute monarch; as we know it may not be enjoyed under a republic. Actual, existing liberty, depends upon the actual, existing administration.

One great cause of diminutions of civil liberty is war, and if no other motive induced a people jealously to scrutinize the grounds of a war, this might be sufficient. The increased loss of personal freedom to a military man is manifest;—and it is considerable to other men. The man who now pays twenty pounds a year in taxes, would probably have paid but two if there had been no war during the past century. If he now gets a hundred and fifty pounds a year by his exertions, he is obliged to labor six weeks out of the fifty-two, to pay the taxes which war has entailed. That is to say, he is compelled to work two hours every day longer than he himself wishes, or than is needful for his support. This is a material deduction from personal liberty, and a man would feel it as such, if the coercion were directly applied—if an officer came to his house every afternoon at four o’clock, when he had finished his business, and obliged him, under penalty of a restraint, to work till six. It is some loss of liberty, again, to a man to be unable to open as many windows in his house as he pleases—or to be forbidden to acknowledge the receipt of a debt without going to the next town for a stamp—or to be obliged to ride in an uneasy carriage unless he will pay for springs. It were to no purpose to say he may pay for windows and springs if he will, and if he can.—A slave may, by the same reasoning, be shown to be free : because, if he will and if he can, he may purchase his freedom. There is a loss of liberty in being obliged to submit to the alternative ; and we should feel it as a loss if such things were not habitual, and if we had not receded so considerably from the liberty of nature.

* Paley : Mor. and Pol. Phil. p. 3, b. 6, c. 5.

Now, indeed, that war has created a large public debt, it is necessary to the general good that its interest should be paid ; and in this view a man's civil liberty is not encroached upon, though his personal liberty is diminished. The public welfare is consulted by the diminution. I may deplore the cause without complaining of the law. It may, upon emergency, be for the public good to suspend the habeas corpus act. I should lament that such a state of things existed, but I should not complain that civil liberty was invaded. The lesson which such considerations teach, is, jealous watchfulness against wars for the future.

“ A law being found to produce no sensible good effects, is a sufficient reason for repealing it.”* It is not, therefore, sufficient to ask in reply, what harm does the law occasion? for you must prove that it does good : because all laws which do no good, do harm. They encroach upon or restrain the liberty of the community, without that reason which only can make the deduction of any portion of liberty right—the public good.

* Paley : Mor. and Pol. Phil. p. 3, b. 6, c. 5.

CHAPTER III.

CIVIL OBEDIENCE.

Expediency of Obedience—Obligations to Obedience—Extent of the Duty—Resistance to the Civil Power—Obedience may be withdrawn—King James—America—Non-compliance—Interference of the Magistrate.

Submission to government is involved in the very idea of the institution. None can govern, if none submit : and hence is derived the duty of submission, so far as it is independent of Christianity. Government being necessary to the good of society, submission is necessary also, and therefore it is right.

This duty is enforced with great distinctness by Christianity—"Be subject to principalities and powers."—"Obey magistrates."—"Submit to every ordinance of man."—The great question, therefore, is, whether the duty be absolute and unconditional ; and if not, what are its limits, and how are they to be ascertained ?

The law of nature proposes few motives to obedience except those which are dictated by expediency. The object of instituting government being the good of the governed, any means of attaining that object is, in the view of natural reason, right. So that, if in any case a government does not effect its proper objects, it may not only be exchanged, but exchanged by any means which will tend on the whole to the public good. Resistance—arms—civil war—every act is, in the view of natural reason, lawful if it is useful. But although good government is the right of the people, it is, nevertheless, not sufficient to release a subject from the obligation of obedience, that a government adopts some measures which he thinks are not conducive to the general good. A wise pagan would not limit his obedience to those measures in which a government acted expediently ; because it is often better for the community that some acts of misgovernment should be borne, than that the general system of obedience should be violated. It is, as a general rule, more necessary to the welfare of a people that governments should be regularly obeyed, than that each of their measures should be good and right. In practice, therefore, even considerations of utility are sufficient, generally, to oblige us to submit to the civil power.

When we turn from the law of nature to Christianity, we find, as we are wont, that the moral cord is tightened, and that not every means of opposing governments for the public good is permitted to us. The consideration of what modes of opposition Christianity allows, and what it forbids, is of great interest and importance.

“Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God : the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. He is the minister of God to thee for good—a revenger, to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. Wherefore, ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake.”*—Upon this often cited and often canvassed passage, three things are to be observed :—

1. That it asserts the general duty of civil obedience, because government is an institution sanctioned by the Deity.

2. That it asserts this duty under the supposition that the governor is a minister of God for good.

3. That it gives but little other information respecting the extent of the duty of obedience.

I. The obligation to obedience is not founded, therefore, simply upon expediency, but upon the more satisfactory and certain ground, the expressed will of God. And here the superiority of this motive over that of fear of the magistrate's power, is manifest. We are to be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake—not only out of fear of man, but out of fidelity to God. This motive, where it operates, is likely, as was observed in the first essay, to produce much more consistent and conscientious obedience than that of expediency or fear.

* Rom. xiii. 1 to 5.

II. The duty is inculcated under the supposition that the governor is a minister for good. It is upon this supposition that the apostle proceeds: "for rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil;" which is tantamount to saying, that if they be not a terror to evil works but to good, the duty of obedience is altered. "The power that is of God," says an intelligent and Christian writer, "leaves neither ruler nor subject to the liberty of his own will, but limits both to the will of God; so that the magistrate hath no power to command evil to be done because he is a magistrate, and the subject hath no liberty to do evil because a magistrate doth command it."* When, therefore, the Christian teacher says, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," he proposes not an absolute but a conditional rule—conditional upon the nature of the actions which the higher powers require. The expression, "There is no power but of God," does not invalidate this conclusion, because the Apostles themselves did not yield unconditional obedience to the powers that were. Similar observations apply to the parallel passage in 1st Peter. "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him, for the punishment of evil doers and for the praise of them that do well." The supposition of the just exercise of power is still kept in view.

* Crisp: "To the Rulers and Inhabitants in Holland, &c. Abt. Ann. 1670.

III. The precepts give little other information than this respecting the extent of the duty of obedience. "Whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God," is, like the direction, to "be subject," a conditional proposition. What precise meeting was here attached to the word "resisteth," cannot perhaps be known; but there is reason to think that the meaning was not designed to be precise—that the proposition was general. "Magistrates are not to be resisted," without defining, or attempting to define the limits of civil obedience.

Upon the whole, this often agitated portion of the Christian Scriptures does not appear to me to convey much information respecting the duties of civil obedience; and although it explicitly asserts the general duty of obedience to the magistrate, it does not inform us how far that duty extends, nor what are its limits.

Concluding, then, that specific rules respecting the extent of civil obedience are not to be found in Scripture, we are brought to the position, that we must ascertain this extent by the general duties which Christianity imposes upon mankind, and by the general principles of political truth. In attempting, upon these grounds, to illustrate our civil duties, I am solicitous to remark that the individual Christian who, regarding himself as a journeyer to a better country, thinks it best for him not to intermeddle in political affairs, may rightly pursue a path of simpler submission and acquiescence than that which I believe Christianity allows. Whatever may be the peculiar business of individuals, the business of man is to act as the Christian citizen—not merely to prepare himself for another world, but to do such good as he may, political as well as social, in the present. And yet so fundamentally, so utterly incongruous with Christian rectitude, is the state of many branches of political affairs in the present day, that I know not whether he who is solicitous to adhere to this rectitude is not both wise and right in standing aloof. This consideration applies, especially, to circumstances in which the limits of civil obedience are brought into practical illustrations. The tumult and violence which ordinarily attend any approach to political revolutions are such, that the best and proper office of a good man may be rather that of a moderator of both parties than of a partisan with either.—Nevertheless, it is fit that the obligations of civil obedience should be distinctly understood.

Referring, then, to political truth, it is to be remembered that governors are established, not for their own advantage but for the people's. If they so far disregard this object of their establishment, as greatly to sacrifice the public welfare, the people (and consequently individuals) may rightly consider whether a change of governors is not dictated by utility; and if it is, they may rightly endeavor to effect such a change by recommending it to the public, and by transferring their obedience to those who, there is reason to believe, will better execute the offices for which government is instituted. I perceive nothing unchristian in this. A man who lived in 1688, and was convinced that it was for the general good that William should be placed on the throne instead of James, was at liberty to promote, by all Christian means, the accession of William, and consequently to withdraw his own, and to recommend others to withdraw their obedience, from James. The support of the bill of exclusion in Charles the Second's reign, was nearly allied to a withdrawing of civil obedience. The Christian of that day who was persuaded that the bill would tend to the public welfare, was right in supporting it, and he would have been equally right in continuing his support if Charles had suddenly died, and his brother had suddenly stepped into the throne. If I had lived in America fifty years ago, and had thought the disobedience of the colonies wrong, and that the whole empire would be injured by their separation from England, I should have thought myself at liberty to urge these considerations upon other men, and otherwise to exert myself (always within the limits of Christian conduct) to support the British cause. I might, indeed, have thought that there was so much violence and wickedness on both sides, that the Christian could take part with neither : but this is an accidental connection, and in no degree affects the principle itself. But when the colonies were actually separated from Britain, and it was manifestly the general will to be independent, I should have readily transferred my obedience to the United States, convinced that the new government was preferred by the people ; that, therefore, it was the rightful government ; and, being such, that it was my Christian duty to obey it.

Now the lawful means of discouraging or promoting an alteration of a government, must be determined by the general duties of Christian morality. There is, as we have seen, nothing in political affairs which conveys a privilege to throw off the Christian character ; and whatever species of opposition or support involves a sacrifice or suspension of this character is, for that reason, wrong. Clamorous and vehement debates and harangues—vituperation and calumny—acts of bloodshed and violence, or instigations to such acts, are, I think, measures in which the first teachers of Christianity would not have participated ; measures which would have violated their own precepts ; and measures, therefore, which a Christian is not at liberty to pursue. Objections to these sentiments will no doubt be at hand : we shall be told that such opposition would be ineffectual against the encroachments of power and the armies of tyranny—that it would be to no purpose to reason with a general who had orders to enforce obedience ; and that the nature of the power to be overcome, dictated the necessity of corresponding power to overcome it. To all which it is, in the first place, a sufficient answer, that the question is not what evils may ensue from an adherence to Christianity, but what Christianity requires. We renew the oft-repeated truth, that Christian rectitude is paramount. When the first Christians refused obedience to some of the existing authorities—they did not resist. They exemplified their own precepts—to prefer the will of God before all ; and if this preference subjected them to evils—to bear them without violating other portions of His will in order to ward them off. But if resistance to the civil power was thus unlawful when the magistrate commanded actions that were morally wrong, much more clearly is it unlawful, when the wrongness consists only in political grievances. The inconveniences of bad governments cannot constitute a superior reason for violence, to that which is constituted by the imposition of laws that are contrary to the laws of God. And if any one should insist upon the magnitude of political grievances, the answer is at hand—these evils cannot cost more to the community as a state, than the other class of evils costs to the individual as a man.

If fidelity is required in private life, through whatever consequences, it is required also in public. The national suffering can never be so great as the individual may be. The individual may lose his life for his fidelity, but there is no such thing as a national martyrdom. Besides it is by on means certain that Christian opposition to misgovernment would be so ineffectual as is supposed. Nothing is so invincible as determinate non-compliance. He that resists by force, may be overcome by greater force; but nothing can overcome a calm and fixed determination not to obey. Violence might, no doubt, slaughter those who practised it, but it were an unusual ferocity to destroy such persons in cool malignity. In such enquiries we forget how much difficulty we entail upon ourselves. A regiment which, after endeavoring to the uttermost to destroy its enemies, refuses to yield, is in circumstances totally dissimilar to that which our reasonings suppose. Such a regiment might be cut to pieces; but it would be, I believe, a "new thing under the sun," to go on slaughtering a people, of whom it was known not only that they had committed no violence, but that they would commit none.

Refer again to America: The Americans thought that it was best for the general welfare that they should be independent, but England persisted in imposing the tax. Imagine, then, America to have acted upon Christian principles, and to have refused to pay it, but without those acts of exasperation and violence which they committed. England might have sent a fleet and an army. To what purpose? Still no one paid the tax. The soldiery perhaps sometimes committed outrages, and they seized goods instead of the impost: still the tax could not be collected, except by a system of universal restraint.—Does any man who employs his reason, believe that England would have overcome such a people? does he believe that any government, or any army would have gone on destroying them? especially does he believe this, if the Americans continually reasoned coolly and honorably with the other party, and manifested, by the unequivocal language of conduct, that they were actuated by reason and by Christian rectitude? No nation exists which would go on slaughtering such a people. It is not in human nature to do such things; and I am persuaded not only that American independence would have been secured, but that very far fewer of the Americans would have been destroyed: that very much less of devastation and misery would have been occasioned if they had acted upon these principles instead of upon the vulgar system of exasperation and violence. In a word, they would have attained the same advantage with more virtue, and at less cost. — With respect to those voluble reasoners who tell us of meanness of spirit, of pusillanimous submission, of base crouching before tyranny, and the like, it may be observed that they do not know what mental greatness is. Courage is not indicated most unequivocally by wearing swords, or by wielding them. Many who have courage enough to take up arms against a bad government, have not courage enough to resist it by the unbending firmness of the mind—to maintain a tranquil fidelity to virtue in opposition to power; or to endure with serenity the consequences which may follow.

The Reformation prospered more by the resolute non-compliance of its supporters, than if all of them had provided themselves with swords and pistols. The most severely persecuted body of Christians which this country has in later ages seen, was a body who never raised the arm of resistance. They wore out that iron rod of oppression which the attrition of violence might have whetted into a weapon that would have cut them off from the earth, and they now reap the fair fruit of their principles in the enjoyment of privileges from which others are still debarred.

There is one class of cases in which obedience is to be refused to the civil power without any view to an alteration of existing institutions—that is, when the magistrate commands that which it would be immoral to obey. What is wrong for the Christian is wrong for the subject. "All human authority ceases at the point where obedience becomes criminal." Of this point of criminality every man must judge ultimately for himself ; for the opinion of another ought not to make him obey when he thinks it is criminal, nor to refuse obedience when he thinks it is lawful. Some even appear to think that the nature of actions is altered by the command of the state ; that what would be unlawful without its command is lawful with it. This notion is founded upon indistinct views of the extent of civil authority ; for this authority can never be so great as that of the Deity, and it is the Deity who requires us not to do evil. The Protestant would not think himself obliged to obey if the state should require him to acknowledge the authority of the Pope ; and why ? Because he thinks it would be inconsistent with the Divine will ; and this precisely is the reason why he should refuse obedience in other cases. He cannot rationally make distinctions, and say, "I ought to refuse obedience in acknowledging the Pope, but I ought to obey in becoming the agent of injustice or oppression." If I had been a Frenchman, and had been ordered, probably at the instigation of some courtesan, to immure a man, whom I knew to be innocent, in the Bastile, I should have refused ; for it never can be right to be the active agent of such iniquity.

Under an enlightened and lenient government like our own, the cases are not numerous in which the Christian is exempted from the obligation to obedience. When, a century or two ago, persecuting acts were passed against some Christian communities, the members of these communities were not merely at liberty, they were required to disobey them. One act imposed a fine of twenty pounds a month for absenting one's self from a prescribed form of worship. He who thought that form less acceptable to the Supreme Being than another, ought to absent himself notwithstanding the law. So, when in the present day, a Christian thinks the profession of arms, or the payment of preachers whom he disapproves, is wrong, he ought, notwithstanding any laws, to decline to pay the money or to bear the arms.

Illegal commands do not appear to carry any obligation to obedience. Thus, when the Apostles had been "beaten openly and uncondemned, being Romans," they did not regard the directions of the magistracy to leave the prison, but asserted their right to legal justice, by making the magistrates "come themselves and fetch them out." When Charles I, made his demands of supplies upon his own illegal authority, I should have thought myself at liberty to refuse to pay them. This were not a disobedience to government. Government was broken. One of its constituent parts refused to impose the tax, and one imposed it. I might, indeed, have held myself in doubt whether Charles constituted the government or not. If the people had thought it best to choose him alone for their ruler, he constituted the government, and his demand would have been legal; for a law is but the voice of that governing power whom the people prefer. As it was, the people did not choose such a government; the demand was illegal, and might therefore be refused.

CHAPTER IV.

POLITICAL INFLUENCE.

Effects of influence—Incongruity of public notions—Patronage —Dependency on the mother country.

THE system of governing by influence appears to be a substitute for the government of force—an intermediate step between awing by the sword and directing by reason and virtue. When the general character of political measures is such, that reason and virtue do not sufficiently support them to recommend them, on their own merits, to the public approbation—these measures must be rejected, or they must be supported by foreign means; and when, by the political institutions of a people, force is necessarily excluded, nothing remains but to have recourse to some species of influence. There is another ground upon which influence becomes, in a certain sense, necessary—which is, that there is so much imperfection of virtue in the majority of legislators—they are so much guided by interested or ambitious or party motives, that for a measure to be recommended by its own excellence, is sometimes not sufficient to procure their concurrence; and thus it happens that influence is resorted to, not merely because public measures are deficient in purity, but because there is a deficiency of uprightness in public men.

The degree of this influence, which may be required to give stability to an executive body, (and therefore to a constitution,) will vary with the character of its own policy. The more widely that policy deviates from rectitude, the greater will be the demand for influence to induce concurrence in its measures. The degree of influence that is actually exerted by a government, is therefore no despicable criterion of the excellence of its practice.

But let it be constantly borne in mind, that when we thus speak of the "necessity" for influence to support governments, we speak only of governments as they are, and of nations as they are. There is no necessity for influence to support good government over a good people. All influence but that which addresses itself to the judgment, is wrong—wrong in morals, and therefore indefensible upon whatever plea.

"All influence but that which addresses itself to the judgment, is wrong." Of the moral offence which this influence implies, many are guilty who oppose governments, as well as those who support them, or as governments themselves. It is evidently not a whit more virtuous to exert influence in opposing governments than in supporting them: nor, indeed, is it so virtuous. To what is a man influenced? Obviously, to do that which, without the influence, he would not do;—that is to say, he is induced to violate his judgment at the request or at the will of other men. It can need no argument to show that this is vicious. In truth, it is vicious in a very high degree; for to conform our conduct to our own sober judgment, is one of the first dictates of the moral law: and the viciousness is so much the greater, because the express purpose for which a man is appointed to legislate, is that the community may have the benefit of his uninfluenced judgment. Breach of trust is added to the sacrifice of individual integrity. A nation can gain nothing by the knowledge or experience of a million of "influenced" legislators. It is curious, that the submission to influence which men often practise as legislators, they would abhor as judges. What should we say of a judge or a jurymen who accepted a place or a promise as a bribe for an unjust sentence? We should prosecute the jurymen and address the parliament for a removal of the judge. Is it then of so much less consequence in what manner affairs of state are conducted than the affairs of individuals, that that which would be disgraceful in one case, is reputable in another? No account can be given of this strange incongruity of public notions, than that custom has in one case blinded our eyes, and in the other has taught us to see. Let the legislator who would abhor to accept a purse to bribe him to write ignoramus upon a true bill, apply the principle upon which his abhorrence is founded to his political conduct. When our moral principles are consistent these incongruities will cease. When uniform truth takes the place of vulgar practice and opinion, these incongruities will become wonderful for their absurdity; and men will scarcely believe that their fathers, who could see so clearly, saw so ill. The same sort of stigma which now attaches to Lord Bacon, will attach to multitudes who pass for honorable persons in the present day.

A man may lawfully, no doubt, take a more active part in political measures, in compliance with the wishes of another, than he might otherwise incline to do; but to support the measures of an opposition or an administration, because they are their measures, can never be lawful.—Nor can it ever be lawful to magnify the advantages or to expatiate upon the mischiefs of a measure, beyond his secret estimate of its demerits or its merits. That legislator is viciously influenced, who says or who does any thing which he would think it not proper to say or do if he were an independent man.

But it will be said, Since influence is inseparable from the possession of patronage, and since patronage must be vested somewhere, what is to be done? or how are the evils of influence to be done away?—a question which, like many other questions in political morality, is attended with accidental rather than essential difficulties. Patronage, in a virtuous state of mankind, would be small. There would be none in the church and little in the state. Men would take the oversight of the Christian flock, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind. If the ready mind existed, the influence of patronage would be needless: and, as a needless thing, it would be done away. And as to the state, when we consider how much of patronage in all nations results from the vicious condition of mankind—especially for military and naval appointments—it will appear that much of this class of patronage is accidental also. Take away that wickedness and violence in which hostile measures originate, and fleets and armies would no longer be needed; and with their dissolution there would be a prodigious diminution of patronage and of influence. So, if we continue the enquiry, how far any given source of influence arising from patronage is necessary to the institution of civil government, we shall find, at last, that the necessary portion is very small. We are little accustomed to consider how simple a thing civil government is—nor what an unnumbered multiplicity of offices and sources of patronage would be cut off, if it existed in its simple and rightful state.

CHAPTER V.

MORAL LEGISLATION.

Duties of a Ruler—The two objects of moral legislation—Education of the People—Abrogation of bad laws.

IF a person who considered the general objects of the institution of civil government, were to look over the titles of the acts of a legislature during fifteen or twenty years, he would probably be surprised to find the proportion so small of those of which it was the express object to benefit the moral character of the people. He would find many laws that respected foreign policy, many perhaps that referred to internal political economy, many for the punishment of crime—but few that tended positively to promote the general happiness by increasing the general virtue. This, I say, may be a reasonable subject of surprise, when it is considered that the attainment of this happiness is the original and proper object of all government. There is a general want of advertence to this object, arising in part, perhaps, from the insufficient degree of conviction that virtue is the best promoter of the general weal.

To prevent an evil is always better than to repair it : for which reason, if it be in the power of the legislator to diminish temptation or its influence, he will find that this is the most efficacious means of diminishing the offences and of increasing the happiness of a people. He who vigilantly detects and punishes vicious men, does well ; but he who prevents them from becoming vicious, does better. It is better, both for a sufferer, for a culprit, and for the community, that a man's purse should remain in his pocket, than that, when it is taken away, the thief should be sure of a prison.

So far as is practicable, a government ought to be to a people, what a judicious parent is to a family—not merely the ruler, but the instructor and the guide. It is not perhaps so much in the power of a government to form the character of a people to virtue or to vice, as it is in the power of a parent to form that of his children. But much can be done if every thing cannot be : and indeed when we take into account the relative duration of the political body as compared with that of a family, we may have reason to doubt whether governments cannot effect as much in ages as parents can do in years. Now, a judicious father adopts a system of moral culture as well as of restraint : he does not merely lop the vagrant branches of his intellectual plant, but he trains and directs them in their proper course. The second object is to punish vice—the first to promote virtue. You may punish vice without securing virtue ; but, if you secure virtue, the whole work is done.

Yet this primary object of moral legislation is that to which, comparatively, little attention is paid. Penalties are multiplied upon the doers of evil, but little endeavor is used to prevent the commission of evil by inducing principles and habits which overpower the tendency to the commission. In this respect, we begin to legislate at the secondary part of our office rather than at the first. We are political surgeons, who cut out the tumors in the state, rather than the prescribers of that wholesome regimen by which the diseases in the political body are prevented.

But here arises a difficulty—How shall that political parent teach virtue which is not virtuous itself? The governments of most nations, however they may inculcate virtue in their enactments, preach it very imperfectly by their example.—What then is to be done? “ Make the tree good.” The first step in moral legislation is to rectify the legislator. It holds of nations as of men, that the beam should be first removed out of our own eye. Laws, in their insulated character, will be but partially effectual, whilst the practical example of a government is bad. To this consideration sufficient attention is not ordinarily paid. We do not adequately estimate the influence of a government's example upon the public character. Government is an object to which we look up as to our superior; and the many interests which prompt men to assimilate themselves to the character of the government, added to the natural tendency of subordinate parts to copy the example of the superior, occasions the character of a government, independently of its particular measures, to be of immense influence upon the general virtue. Illustrations abound. If, in any instance, political subserviency is found to be a more efficient recommendation than integrity of character, it is easy to perceive that subserviency is practically inculcated, and that integrity is practically discouraged.

Amongst that portion, then, of a legislator's office which consists in endeavoring the moral amelioration of a people, the amendment of political institutions is conspicuous. In proportion to the greatness of the influence of governments, is the obligation to direct that influence in favor of virtue. A government of which the principles and practice were accordant with rectitude, would very powerfully affect the general morals. He, therefore, who explodes one vicious principle, or who amends one corrupt practice, is to be regarded as amongst the most useful and honorable of public men.

If, however, in any state there are difficulties, at present insurmountable, in the way of improving political institutions, still let us do what we can. Precept without example may do some good: nor are we to forget, that if the public virtue is increased by whatever means, it will react upon the governing power. A good people will not long tolerate a bad government.

Amongst the most obvious means of rectifying the general morals by positive measures, one is the encouraging a judicious education of the people. Upon this judiciousness almost all its success depends.

But you say, All this will add to the national burdens. We need not be very jealous on this head, whilst we are so little jealous of more money worse spent. Is it known, or is it considered, that the expense of an ordinary campaign would endow a school in every parish in England and Ireland for ever? Yet how coolly (who will contradict me if I say—how needlessly?) we devote money to conduct a campaign!—Prevent, by a just and conciliating policy, one single war, and the money thus saved would provide, perpetually, a competent mental and moral education for every individual who needs it in the three kingdoms. Let a man for a moment indulge his imagination—let him rather indulge his reason, in supposing that one of our wars during the last century had been avoided, and that, fifty years ago, such an education had been provided. Of what comparative importance is the war to us now? In the one case, the money has provided the historian with materials to fill his pages with armaments, and victories, and defeats:—it has enabled us

To point a moral or adorn a tale;

—in the other, it would have effected, and would be now effecting, and would be destined for ages to effect, a great amount of solid good; a great increase of the virtue, the order, and the happiness of the people.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE PROPER ENDS OF PUNISHMENT.

The Three Objects of Punishment :—Reformation of the Offender :—Example :—Restitution—Punishment may be increased as well as diminished.

WHY is a man who commits an offence punished for the act? Is it for his own advantage, or for that of others, or for both?—For both, and primarily for his own :* which answer will perhaps the more readily recommend itself, if it can be shown that the good of others, that is, of the public, is best consulted by those systems of punishment which are most effectual in benefiting the offender himself.

When we recur to the precepts and the spirit of Christianity, we find that the one great pervading principle by which it requires us to regulate our conduct towards others, is that of operative, practical good-will—that good-will which, if they be in suffering, will prompt us to alleviate the misery ; if they be vicious, will prompt us to reclaim them from vice. That the misconduct of the individual exempts us from the obligation to regard this rule, it would be futile to imagine. It is by him that the exercise of benevolence is peculiarly needed. He is the morally sick, who needs the physician ; and such a physician he, who by comparison is morally whole, should be. If we adopt the spirit of the declaration, “I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance,” we shall entertain no doubt that the reformation of offenders is the primary business of the Christian in devising punishments. There appears no reason why, in the case of public criminals, the spirit of the rule should not be acted upon—"If a brother be overtaken in a fault restore such an one." Amongst the Corinthians there was an individual who had committed a gross offence, such as is now punished by the law of England. Of this criminal Paul speaks in strong terms of reprobation in the first epistle. The effect proved to be good; and the offender having apparently become reformed, the Corinthians were directed in the second epistle, to forgive and to comfort him.

* “The end of all correction is either the amendment of wicked men or to prevent the influence of ill example.” This is the rule of Seneca ; and by mentioning amendment first, he appears to have regarded it as the primary object.

When therefore a person has committed a crime, the great duty of those who in common with himself are candidates for the mercy of God, is to endeavor to meliorate and rectify the dispositions in which his crime originates; to subdue the vehemence of his passions—to raise up in his mind a power that may counteract the power of future temptation. We should feel towards these mentally diseased, as we feel towards the physical sufferer—compassion; and the great object should be to cure the disease. No doubt, in endeavoring this object, severe remedies must often be employed. It is just what we should expect; and the remedies will probably be severe in proportion to the inveteracy and malignity of the complaint. But still the end should never be forgotten, and I think a just estimate of our moral obligations, will lead us to regard the attainment of that end as paramount to every other.

There is one great practical advantage in directing the attention especially to this moral cure, which is this, that if it be successful, it prevents the offender from offending again. It is well known that the proportion of those who, having once suffered the stated punishment, again transgress the laws and are again convicted, is great. But to whatever extent reformation was attained, this unhappy result would be prevented.

The second object of punishment, that of example, appears to be recognised as right by Christianity, when it says that the magistrate is a "terror" to bad men; and when it admonishes such to be "afraid" of his power. There can be no reason for speaking of punishment as a terror, unless it were right to adopt such punishments as would deter. In the private discipline of the church the same idea is kept in view:—"Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear."* The parallel of physical disease may also still hold. The offender is a member of the social body; and the physician who endeavors to remove a local disease, always acts with a reference to the health of the system.

In stating reformation as the first object, we also conclude, that if, in any case, the attainment of reformation and the exhibition of example should be found to be incompatible, the former is to be preferred. I say if; for it is by no means certain that such cases will ever arise. The measures which are necessary to reformation must operate as example; and in general, since the reformation of the more hardened offenders is not to be expected, except by severe measures, the influence of terror in endeavoring reformation will increase with the malignity of the crime. This is just what we need and what the penal legislator is so solicitous to secure. The point for the exercise of wisdom is, to attain the second object in attaining the first. A primary regard to the first object is compatible with many modifications of punishment, in order more effectually to attain the second. If there are two measures, of which both tend alike to reformation, and one tends most to operate as example, that one should unquestionably be preferred.

* 1 Tim. v. 20.

There is a third object which, though subordinate to the others, might perhaps still obtain greater notice from the legislator than it is wont to do—restitution or compensation.* Since what are called criminal actions are commonly injuries committed by one man upon another, it appears to be a very obvious dictate of reason that the injury should be repaired;—that he from whom the thief steals a purse should regain its value; that he who is injured in his person or otherwise, should receive such compensation as he may. When my house is broken into and a hundred pounds' worth of property is carried off, it is but an imperfect satisfaction to me that the robber will be punished. I ought to recover the value of my property. The magistrate, in taking care of the general, should take care of the individual weal. The laws of England do now award compensation in damages for some injuries. This is a recognition of the principle; although it is remarkable, not only that the number of offences which are thus punished is small, but that they are frequently of a sort in which pecuniary loss has not been sustained by the injured party.

I do not imagine that in the present state of penal law, or of the administration of justice, a general regard to compensation is practicable, but this does not prove that it ought not to be regarded. If in an improved state of penal affairs, it should be found practicable to oblige offenders to recompense by their labor those who had suffered by their crime, this advantage would attend, that while it would probably involve considerable punishment, it would approve itself to the offender's mind as the demand of reason and of justice.

* "The law of nature commands that reparation be made." Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 6, c. 8. And this dictate of nature appears to have been recognized in the Mosaic law, in which compensation to the suffering party is expressly required.

This is no trifling consideration ; for in every species of coercion and punishment, public or domestic, it is of consequence that the punished party should feel the justice and propriety of the measures which are adopted.

---

Respecting the relative utility of different modes of punishment and of prison discipline, we have little to say, partly because the practical recognition of reformation as a primary object affords good security for the adoption of judicious measures, and partly because these topics have already obtained much of the public attention. One suggestion may, however, be made, that as good consequences have followed from making a prisoner's confinement depend for its duration on his conduct, so that if it be exemplary the period is diminished, there appears no sufficient reason why the parallel system should not be adopted of increasing the original sentence if his conduct continue vicious. There is no breach of reason or of justice in this. For the reasonable object of punishment is to attain certain ends, and if, by the original sentence, it is found that these ends are not attained, reason appears to dictate that stronger motives should be employed.—It cannot surely be less reasonable to add to a culprit's penalty if his conduct be bad, than to deduct from it if it be good. For a sentence should not be considered as a propitiation of the law, nor when it is inflicted should it be considered, as of necessity, that all is done. The sentence which the law pronounces is a general rule—good perhaps as a general rule, but sometimes inadequate to its end. And the utility of retaining the power of adding to a penalty is the same in kind, and probably greater in degree, than the power of diminishing it. In one case the culprit is influenced by hope, and in the other by fear. Fear is the more powerful agent upon some men's minds, and hope upon others. And as to the justice of such an institution, it appears easily to be vindicated ; for what is the standard of justice? The sentence of the law? No ; for if it were, it would be unjust to abate of it as well as to add. Is it the original crime of the offender? No ; for if it were, the same crime, by whatever variety of conduct it was afterwards followed, must always receive an equal penalty. The standard of justice is to be estimated by the ends for which punishments are inflicted. Now, although it would be too much to affirm that any penalty, or duration of penalty, would be just until these ends were attained, yet surely it is not unjust to endeavor their attainment by some additions to an original penalty when they cannot be attained without.

---

CHAPTER VII.

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

Of the three objects of punishment, the punishment of death regards but one—Reformation of minor offenders: Greater criminals neglected—Capital punishments not efficient as examples—Public executions—Paul—Grotius—Murder—The punishment of death irrevocable—Rousseau—Recapitulation.

I SELECT for observation this peculiar mode of punishment on account of its peculiar importance.

And here we are impressed at the outset with the consideration, that of the three great objects which have just been proposed as the proper ends of punishment, the punishment of death regards but one ; and that one not the first and the greatest. The only end which is consulted in taking the life of an offender, is that of example to other men. His own reformation is put almost out of the question. Now if the principles delivered in the preceding chapter be sound, they present at once an almost insuperable objection to the punishment of death. If reformation be the primary object, and if the punishment of death precludes attention to that object, the punishment of death is wrong.

To take the life of a fellow-creature is to exert the utmost possible power which man can possess over man. It is to perform an action the most serious and awful which a human being can perform. Respecting such an action, then, can any truth be more manifest than that the dictates of Christianity ought, especially to be taken into account? If these dictates are rightly urged upon us in the minor concerns of life, can any man doubt whether they ought to influence us in the greatest? Yet what is the fact? Why, that in defending capital punishments, these dictates are almost placed out of the question. We hear a great deal about security of property and life, a great deal about the necessity of making examples; but almost nothing about the moral law. It might be imagined that upon this subject our religion imposed no obligations; for nearly every argument that is urged in favor of capital punishments would be as valid and as appropriate in the mouth of a pagan as in our own. Can this be right? Is it conceivable that, in the exercise of the most tremendous agency which is in the power of man, it can be right to exclude all reference to the expressed will of God?

I acknowledge that this exclusion of the Christian law from the defences of the punishment, is to me almost a conclusive argument that the punishment is wrong. Nothing that is right can need such an exclusion; and we should not practise it if it were not for a secret perception, that to apply the pure requisitions of Christianity would not serve the purpose of the advocate. Look for a moment upon the capital offender and upon ourselves. He, a depraved and deep violator of the law of God—one who is obnoxious to the vengeance of heaven—one, however, whom Christ came peculiarly to call to repentance and to save—Ourselves, his brethren—brethren by the relationship of nature—brethren in some degree in offences against God—brethren especially in the trembling hope of a common salvation. How ought beings so situated to act towards one another? Ought we to kill or to amend him? Ought we, so far as is in our power, to cut off his future hope, or, so far as is in our power, to strengthen the foundation of that hope? Is it the reasonable or decent office of one candidate for the mercy of God to hang his fellow-candidate upon a gibbet? I am serious, though men of levity may laugh. If such men reject Christianity, I do not address them. If they admit its truth, let them manfully show that its principles should not thus be applied.

No one disputes that the reformation of offenders is desirable, though some may not allow it to be the primary object. For the purposes of reformation we have recourse to constant oversight—to classification of offenders—to regular labor—to religious instruction. For whom? For minor criminals. Do not the greater criminals need reformation too? If all these endeavors are necessary to effect the amendment of the less depraved, are they not necessary to effect the amendment of the more? But we stop just where our exertions are most needed; as if the reformation of a bad man was of the less consequence as the intensity of his wickedness became greater. If prison discipline and a penitentiary be needful for sharpers and pickpockets, surely they are necessary for murderers and highwaymen. Yet we reform the one and hang the other!

Since, then, so much is sacrificed to extend the terror of example, we ought to be indisputably certain that the terror of capital punishment is greater than that of all others. We ought not certainly to sacrifice the requisitions of the Christian law unless we know that a regard to them would be attended with public evil.* Do we know this? Are we indisputably certain that capital punishments are more efficient as examples than any others? We are not. We do not know from experience, and we cannot know without it. —In England the experiment has not been made. The punishment therefore is wrong in us, whatever it might be in a more experienced people. For it is wrong unless it can be shown to be right. It is not a neutral affair. If it is not indispensably necessary, it is unwarrantable. And since we do not know that it is indispensable, it is, so far as we are concerned, unwarrantable.

And with respect to the experience of other nations, who will affirm that crimes have been increased in consequence of the diminished frequency of executions? Who will affirm that the laws and punishments of America are not as effectual as our own? Yet they have abolished capital punishment for all private crimes except murder of the first degree. Where, then, is our pretension to a justification of our own practice? It is a satisfaction that so many facts and arguments are before the public which show the inefficacy of the punishment of death in this country; and this is one reason why they are not introduced here. “There are no practical despisers of death like those who touch, and taste, and handle death daily, by daily committing capital offences. They make a jest of death in all its forms; and all its terrors are in their mouths a scorn.”* “Profligate criminals, such as common thieves and highwaymen,” “have always been accustomed to look upon the gibbet as a lot very likely to fall to them. When it does fall to them therefore, they consider themselves only as not quite so lucky as some of their companions, and submit to their fortune without any other uneasiness than what may arise from the fear of death—a fear which even, by such worthless wretches, we frequently see can be so easily and so very completely conquered.” A man some time ago was executed for uttering forged bank-notes, and the body was delivered to his friends. What was the effect of the example upon them? Why, with the corpse lying on a bed before them, they were themselves seized in the act of again uttering forged bank-notes. The testimony upon a subject like this, of a person who has had probably greater and better opportunities of ascertaining the practical efficiency of punishments than any other individual in Europe, is of great importance. “Capital convicts,” says Elizabeth Fry, “pacify their conscience with the dangerous and most fallacious notion, that the violent death which awaits them will serve as a full atonement for all their sins.” † It is their passport to felicity—the purchase-money of heaven! Of this deplorable notion the effect is doubly bad. First, it makes them comparatively little afraid of death, because they necessarily regard it as so much less an evil; and, secondly, it encourages them to go on in the commission of crimes, because they imagine that the number or enormity of them, however great, will not preclude them from admission into heaven. Of both these mischiefs, the punishment of death is the immediate source. Substitute another punishment, and they will not think that that is an

* We ought not for any reason to do this; but I speak in the present paragraph of the pretensions of expediency.

* Irving's Orations. † Observations on the visiting, &c., of Female Prisoners, p. 73.

“atonement for their sins,” and will not receive their present encouragement to continue their crimes. But with respect to example, this unexceptionable authority speaks in decided language. “The terror of example is very generally rendered abortive by the predestinarian notion, vulgarly prevalent among thieves, that ‘if they are to be hanged they are to be hanged, and nothing can prevent it.’” * It may be said that the same notion might be attached to any other punishment, and that thus that other would become abortive; but there is little reason to expect this, at least in the same degree. The notion is now connected expressly with hanging, and it is not probable that the same notion would ever be transferred with equal power to another penalty. Where then is the overwhelming evidence of utility, which alone, even in the estimate of expediency, can justify the punishment of death? It cannot be adduced; it does not exist.

But if capital punishments do little good, they do much harm. “The frequent public destruction of life has a fearfully hardening effect upon those whom it is intended to intimidate. While it excites in them the spirit of revenge, it seldom fails to lower their estimate of the life of man, and renders them less afraid of taking it away in their turn by acts of personal violence.” † This is just what a consideration of the principles of the human mind would teach us to expect. To familiarize men with the destruction of life, is to teach them not to abhor that destruction. It is the legitimate process of the mind in other things. He who blushes and trembles the first time he utters a lie, learns by repetition to do it with callous indifference. Now you execute a man in order to do good by the spectacle—while the practical consequence, it appears, is, that bad men turn away from the spectacle more prepared to commit violence than before. It will be said, that this effect is produced only upon those who are already profligate, and that a salutary example is held out to the public. But the answer is at hand—The public do not usually begin with capital crimes. These are committed after the person has become depraved—that is, after he has arrived at that state in which an execution will harden rather than deter him. We “lower their estimate of the life of man.” It cannot be doubted. It is the inevitable tendency of executions. There is much of justice in an observation of Beccaria’s. “Is it not absurd that the laws which detect and punish homicide should, in order to prevent murder, publicly commit murder themselves?”* By the procedures of a court, we virtually and perhaps literally expatiate upon the sacredness of human life, upon the dreadful guilt of taking it away—and then forthwith take it away ourselves! It is no subject of wonder that this “lowers the estimate of the life of man.” The next sentence of the writer upon whose testimony I offer these comments, is of tremendous import:—“There is much reason to believe that our public executions have had a direct and positive tendency to promote both murder and suicide.” “Why, if a considerable time elapse between the trial and the execution, do we find the severity of the public changed into compassion? For the same reason that a master, if he do not beat his slave in the moment of resentment, often feels a repugnance to the beating him at all.”† This is remarkable. If executions were put off for a twelve-month, I doubt whether the public would bear them. But why if they were just and right? Respecting “the contempt and indignation with which every one looks on an executioner," Beccaria says the reason is, "that in a secret corner of the mind, in which the original impressions of nature are still preserved, men discover a sentiment which tells them that their lives are not lawfully in the power of any one."* Let him who has the power of influencing the legislature of the country or public opinion, (and who has not?) consider the responsibility which this declaration implies, if he lifts his voice for the punishment of death!

* Observations on the visiting, &c., of Female Prisoners, p. 73.

† Ibid.

* Essay on Capital Punishments ; c. 28.

† Godwin : Enq. Pol. Just. v. 2, p. 726.

But further: the execution of one offender excites in others "the spirit of revenge." This is extremely natural. Many a soldier, I dare say, has felt impelled to revenge the death of his comrades; and the member of a gang of thieves, who has fewer restraints of principle, is likely to feel it too. But upon whom is his revenge inflicted? Upon the legislature, or the jury, or the witnesses? No, but upon the public or upon the first person whose life is in their power, and which they are prompted to take away. You execute a man, then, in order to save the lives of others; and the effect is, that you add new inducements to take the lives of others away.

Of a system which is thus unsound—unsound because it rejects some of the plainest dictates of the moral law—and unsound because so many of its effects are bad, I should be ready to conclude, with no other evidence, that it was utterly inexpedient and impolitic—that as it was bad in morals, it was bad in policy. And such appears to be the fact.—"It is incontrovertibly proved that punishments of a milder and less injurious nature are calculated to produce, for every good purpose, a far more powerful effect."†

Finally.—"The best of substitutes for capital punishment will be found in that judicious management of * Beccaria: Essay on Capital Punishments, chap. 28.

† Observations on the visiting, &c., of Female Prisoners, p. 75 criminals in prison which it is the object of the present tract to recommend ;”* which management is Christian management—a system in which reformation is made the first object, but in which it is found that in order to effect reformation severity to hardened offenders is needful. Thus then we arrive at the goal :—we begin with urging the system that Christianity dictates as right ; we conclude by discovering that, as it is the right system, so it is practically the best.

---

But an argument in favor of capital punishments has been raised from the Christian Scriptures themselves.—“If I be an offender, or have committed anything worthy of death, I refuse not to die.”† This is the language of an innocent person who was persecuted by malicious enemies. It was an assertion of innocence ; an assertion that he had done nothing worthy of death. The case had no reference to the question of the lawfulness of capital punishment, but to the question of the lawfulness of inflicting it upon him. Nor can it be supposed that it was the design of the speaker to convey any sanction of the punishment itself, because the design would have been wholly foreign to the occasion. The argument of Grotius goes perhaps too far for his own purpose. “If I be an offender, or have done anything worthy of death, I refuse not to die.” He refused not to die, then, if he were an offender, if he had done one of the “many and grievous things” which the Jews charged upon him. But will it be contended that he meant to sanction the destruction of every person who was thus “an offender?”—His enemies were endeavoring to take his life, and he, in earnest asseveration of his innocence, says, “If you can fix your charges upon me, take it.”

* Observations on the visiting, &c., of Female Prisoners, p. 76.

† Acts, xxv. 11 ; see Grotius : Rights of War and Peace.

Grotius adduces, as an additional evidence of the sanction of the punishment by Christianity, this passage, "Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, &c.—What glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God."* Some arguments disprove the doctrine which they are advanced to support, and this surely is one of them. It surely cannot be true that Christianity sanctions capital punishments, if this is the best evidence of the sanction that can be found. †

Some persons again suppose that there is a sort of moral obligation to take the life of a murderer: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." This supposition is an example of that want of advertence to the supremacy of the Christian morality, which in the first essay we had occasion to notice. Our law is the Christian law, and if Christianity by its precepts or spirit prohibits the punishment of death, it cannot be made right to Christians by referring to a commandment which was given to Noah. There is, in truth, some inconsistency in the reasonings of those who urge the passage. The fourth, fifth, and sixth verses of Genesis ninth, each contains a law delivered to Noah. Of these three laws, we habitually disregard two: how then can we with reason insist on the authority of the third? ‡

After all, if the command were in full force, it would not justify our laws; for they shed the blood of many who have not shed blood themselves.

* 1 Pet. ii. 18, 20.

† "Wickliffe," says Priestley, "seems to have thought it wrong to take away the life of a man on any account."

‡ Indeed it would almost appear from Genesis ix. 5, that even accidental homicide was thus to be punished with death: and if so, it is wholly disregarded in our present practice.

And this conducts us to the observation, that the grounds upon which the United States of America still affix death to murder of the first degree, do not appear very clear ; for if other punishments are found effectual in deterring from crimes of all degrees of enormity up to the last, how is it shown that they would not be effectual in the last also? There is nothing in the constitution of the human mind to indicate, that a murderer is influenced by passions which require that the counteracting power should be totally different from that which is employed to restrain every other crime. The difference too in the personal guilt of the perpetrators of some other crimes, and of murder, is sometimes extremely small. At any rate, it is not so great as to imply a necessity for a punishment totally dissimilar. The truth appears to be, that men entertain a sort of indistinct notion that murder is a crime which requires a peculiar punishment, which notion is often founded, not upon any process of investigation, by which the propriety of this peculiar punishment is discovered, but upon some vague ideas respecting the nature of the crime itself. But the dictate of philosophy is, to employ that punishment which will be most efficacious. Efficacy is the test of its propriety ; and in estimating this efficacy, the character of the crime is a foreign consideration. Again, the dictate of Christianity is, to employ that punishment which, while it deters the spectator, reforms the man. Now, neither philosophy nor Christianity appears to be consulted in punishing murder with death, because it is murder. And it is worthy of especial remembrance, that the purpose for which Grotius defends the punishment of death is, that he may be able to defend the practice of war :—a bad foundation if this be its best !

. It is one objection to capital punishment that it is absolutely irrevocable. If an innocent man suffers it is impossible to recall the sentence of the law. Not that this consideration alone is a sufficient argument against it, but it is one argument amongst the many. In a certain sense, indeed, all personal punishments are irrevocable. The man who by a mistaken verdict has been confined twelve months in a prison, cannot be repossessed of the time. But if irrevocable punishments cannot be dispensed with, they should not be made needlessly common, and especially those should be regarded with jealousy which admit of no removal or relaxation in the event of subsequently discovered innocence, or subsequent reformation. It is not sufficiently considered that a jury or a court of justice never know that a prisoner is guilty.—A witness may know it who saw him commit the act, but others cannot know it who depend upon testimony, for testimony may be mistaken or false. All verdicts are founded upon probabilities—probabilities which, though they sometimes approach to certainty, never attain to it. Surely it is a serious thing for one man to destroy another upon grounds short of absolute certainty of his guilt. There is a sort of indecency attached to it—an assumption of a degree of authority which ought to be exercised only by Him whose knowledge is infallibly true. It is unhappily certain that some have been put to death for actions which they never committed. At one assizes, we believe, not less than six persons were hanged, of whom it was afterwards discovered that they were entirely innocent. A deplorable instance is given by Dr. Smollett:—"Rape and murder were perpetrated upon an unfortunate woman in the neighborhood of London, and an innocent man suffered death for this complicated outrage, while the real criminals assisted at his execution, heard him appeal to Heaven for his innocence, and in the character of friends embraced him while he stood on the brink of eternity."* Others equally innocent, but whose innocence has never been made known, have doubtless shared the same fate. These are tremendous considerations, and ought to make men solemnly pause before, upon grounds necessarily uncertain, they take away that life which God has given, and which they cannot restore.

* Hist. of Eng. v. 3, p. 318.

Of the merely philosophical speculations respecting the rectitude of capital punishments, whether affirmative or negative, I would say little ; for they in truth deserve little. One advantage indeed attends a brief review—that the reader will perceive how little the speculations of philosophers will aid us in the investigation of a Christian question.

The philosopher, however, would prove what the Christian cannot, and Mably accordingly says, “ In the state of nature, I have a right to take the life of him who lifts his arm against mine. This right, upon entering into society, I surrender to the magistrate.” If we conceded the truth of the first position, (which we do not,) the conclusion from it is an idle sophism ; for it is obviously preposterous to say, that because I have a right to take the life of a man who will kill me if I do not kill him, the state, which is in no such danger, has a right to do the same. That danger which constitutes the alleged right in the individual, does not exist in the case of the state. The foundation of the right is gone, and where can be the right itself? Having, however, been thus told that the state has a right to kill, we are next informed, by Filangieri, that the criminal has no right to live. He says, “ If I have a right to kill another man, he has lost his right to life.”* Rousseau goes a little further. He tells us, that in consequence of the “ social contract ” which we make with the sovereign on entering into society, “ Life is a conditional grant of the state :”* so that we hold our lives, it seems, only as “tenants at will,” and must give them up whenever their owner, the state, requires them. The reader has probably hitherto thought that he retained his head by some other tenure.

* Montagu on Punishment of Death.

The right of taking an offender’s life being thus proved, Mably shows us how its exercise becomes expedient. “A murderer,” says he, “in taking away his enemy’s life, believes he does him the greatest possible evil. Death, then, in the murderer’s estimation, is the greatest of evils. By the fear of death, therefore, the excesses of hatred and revenge must be restrained.” If language wilder than this can be held, Rousseau, I think, holds it. He says, “The preservation of both sides (the criminal and the state) is incompatible ; one of the two must perish.” How it happens that a nation “must perish,” if a convict is not hanged, the reader, I suppose, will not know. Even philosophy, however, concedes as much : “Absolute necessity alone,” says Pastoret, “can justify the punishment of death ;” and Rousseau himself acknowledges that “we have no right to put to death, even for the sake of example, any but those who cannot be permitted to live without danger.” Beccaria limits the right to one specific case—and in doing this he appears to sacrifice his own principle, (deduced from that splendid fiction, the “social contract,”) which is, that “the punishment of death is not authorized by any right :—no such right exists.”

For myself, I perceive little value in such speculations to whatever conclusions they lead, for there are shorter and surer roads to truth ; but it is satisfactory to find that, even upon the principles of such philosophers, the right to put criminals to death is not easily made out.

---

The argument, then, respecting the punishment of death is both distinct and short.

* Contr. Soc. ii. 5, Montagu.

It rejects, by its very nature, a regard to the first and greatest object of punishment.

It does not attain either of the other objects so well as they may be attained by other means.

It is attended with numerous evils peculiarly its own.

---

CHAPTER VIII.

RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS.

The primitive church—The established church of Ireland—America—Advantages and disadvantages of established churches—Alliance of a church with the state—Persecution generally the growth of religious establishments—State religions injurious to the civil welfare of a people—Voluntary payment.

A LARGE number of persons embark from Europe, and colonize an uninhabited territory in the South Sea. They erect a government—suppose a republic—and make all persons, of whatever creed, eligible to the legislature. The community prospers and increases. In process of time a member of the legislature, who is a disciple of John Wesley, persuades himself that it will tend to the promotion of religion that the preachers of Methodism should be supported by a national tax; that their stipends should be sufficiently ample to prevent them from necessary attention to any business but that of religion; and that accordingly they shall be precluded from the usual pursuits of commerce and from the professions. He proposes the measure. It is contended against by the Episcopalian members, and the Independents, and the Catholics, and the Unitarians—by all but the adherents to his own creed. They insist upon the equality of civil and religious rights, but in vain. The majority prove to be Methodists ; they support the measure : the law is enacted ; and Methodism becomes, thenceforth, the religion of the state. This is a religious establishment.

But it is a religious establishment in its best form ; and, perhaps, none ever existed of which the constitution was so simple and so pure. During one portion of the papal history, the Romish church was indeed not so much an “ establishment ” of the state as a separate and independent constitution. For though some species of alliance subsisted, yet the Romanists did not acknowledge, as Protestants now do, that the power of establishing a religion resides in the state.

In the present day other immunities are possessed by ecclesiastical establishments than those which are necessary to constitute the institution—such, for example, as that of exclusive eligibility to the legislature : and other alliances with the civil power exist than that which necessarily results from any preference of a particular faith—such as that of placing ecclesiastical patronage in the hands of a government, or of those who are under its influence. From these circumstances it happens, that in enquiring into the propriety of religious establishments, we cannot confine ourselves to the enquiry whether they are proper as they usually exist. And this is so much the more needful, because there is little reason to expect that when once an ecclesiastical establishment has been erected—when once a particular church has been selected for the preference and patronage of the civil power—that preference and patronage will be confined to those circumstances which are necessary to the subsistence of an establishment at all.

It is sufficiently obvious that it matters nothing to the existence of an established church, what the faith of that church is, or what is the form of its government.

It is not the creed which constitutes the establishment, but the preference of the civil power. Our business is not with churches but with church establishments.

The actual history of religious establishments in Christian countries, does not differ in essence from that which we have supposed in the South Sea. They have been erected by the influence or the assistance of the civil power. In one country a religion may have owed its political supremacy to the superstitions of a prince; and in another to his policy or ambition: but the effect has been similar. Whether superstition or policy, the contrivances of a priesthood, or the fortuitous predominance of a party, have given rise to the established church, is of comparatively little consequence to the fundamental principles of the institution.

The only ground upon which it appears that religious establishments can be advocated are, first, that of example or approbation in the primitive churches; and, secondly, that of public utility.

I. The primitive church was not a religious establishment in any sense or in any degree. No establishment existed until the church had lost much of its purity. Nor is there any expression in the New Testament, direct or indirect, which would lead a reader to suppose that Christ or his apostles regarded an establishment as an eligible institution. "We find, in his religion no scheme of building up a hierarchy, or of ministering to the views of human governments."—"Our religion, as it came out of the hands of its Founder and his apostles, exhibited a complete abstraction from all views either of ecclesiastical or civil policy."* The evidence which these facts supply respecting the moral character of religious establishments, whatever be its weight, tends manifestly to show that that character is not good. I do not say because Christianity exhibited this "complete abstraction," that it therefore necessarily condemned establishments; but I say that the bearing and the tendency of this negative testimony is against them.

* Paley : Evidences of Christianity, p. 2, c. 2.

In the discourses and writings of the first teachers of our religion, we find such absolute disinterestedness, so little disposition to assume political superiority, that to have become the members of an established church would certainly have been inconsistent in them. It is indeed almost inconceivable that they could ever have desired the patronage of the state for themselves or for their converts. No man conceives that Paul or John could have participated in the exclusion of any portion of the Christian church from advantages which they themselves enjoyed. Every man perceives that to have done this, would have been to assume a new character, a character which they had never exhibited before, and which was incongruous with their former principles and motives of action. But why is this incongruous with the apostolic character unless it is incongruous with Christianity? Upon this single ground, therefore, there is reason for the sentiment of "many well-informed persons, that it seems extremely questionable whether the religion of Jesus Christ admits of any civil establishment at all."*

I lay stress upon these considerations. We all know that much may be learnt respecting human duty by a contemplation of the spirit and temper of Christianity as it was exhibited by its first teachers. When the spirit and temper is compared with the essential character of religious establishments, they are found to be incongruous—foreign to one another—having no natural relationship or similarity. I should regard such facts, in reference to any question of rectitude, as of great importance ; but upon a subject so intimately connected with religion itself, the importance is peculiarly great.

* Simpson's Plea for Religion and the Sacred Writings.

II. The question of the utility of religious establishments is to be decided by a comparison of their advantages and their evils.

Of their advantages, the first and greatest appears to be that they provide, or are assumed to provide, religious instruction for the whole community. If this instruction be left by the state to be cared for by each Christian church as it possesses the zeal or the means, it may be supposed that many districts will be destitute of any public religious instruction. At least the state cannot be assured before hand that every district will be supplied. And when it is considered how great is the importance of regular public worship to the virtue of a people, it is not to be denied, that a scheme which, by destroying an establishment, would make that instruction inadequate or uncertain, is so far to be regarded as of questionable expediency. But the effect which would be produced by dispensing with establishments is to be estimated, so far as is in our power, by facts. Now dissenters are in the situation of separate unestablished churches. If they do not provide for the public officers of religion voluntarily, they will not be provided for. Yet where is any considerable body of dissenters to be found who do not provide themselves with a chapel and a preacher? And if those churches which are not established, do in fact provide public instruction, how is it shown that it would not be provided although there were no established religion in a state? Besides, the dissenters from an established church provide this under peculiar disadvantages ; for after paying, in common with others, their quota to the state religion, they have to pay in addition to their own. But perhaps it will be said that dissenters from a state religion are actuated by a zeal with which the professors of that religion are not ; and that the legal provision supplies the deficiency of zeal. If this be said, the inquiry imposes itself—How does this disproportion of zeal arise? Why should dissenters be more zealous than churchmen? What account can be given of the matter, but that there is something in the patronage of the state which induces apathy upon the church that it prefers? One other account may indeed be offered—that to be a dissenter is to be a positive religionist, whilst to be a churchman is frequently only to be nothing else ; that an establishment embraces all who are not embraced by others ; and that if those whom other churches do not include were not cared for by the state religion, they would not be cared for at all. This is an argument of apparent weight, but the effect of reasoning is to diminish that weight. For what is meant by “including,” by “caring for,” the indifferent and irreligious? An established church only offers them instruction ; it does not “compel them to come in,” and we have just seen that this offer is made by unestablished churches also. Who doubts whether in a district that is sufficient to fill a temple of the state religion, there would be found persons to offer a temple of public worship though the state did not compel it? Who doubts whether this would be the case if the district were inhabited by dissenters? and if it would not be done supposing the inhabitants to belong to the state religion, the conclusion is inevitable, that there is a tendency to indifference resulting from the patronage of the state.

To estimate the relative influence of religion in two countries is no easy task. Yet, I believe, if we compare its influence in the United States with that which it possesses in most of the European countries which possess state religions, it will be found that the balance is in favor of the community in which there is no established church : at any rate, the balance is not so much against it as to afford any evidence in favor of a state religion. A traveller in America has remarked "There is more religion in the United States than in England, and more in England than in Italy. The closer the monopoly, the less abundant the supply." * Another traveller writes almost as if he had anticipated the present disquisition—"It has been often said, that the disinclination of the heart to religious truth, renders a state establishment absolutely necessary for the purpose of Christianizing the country. Ireland and America can furnish abundant evidence of the fallacy of such an hypothesis. In the one country we see an ecclesiastical establishment of the most costly description utterly inoperative in dispelling ignorance or refuting error ; in the other no establishment of any kind, and yet religion making daily and hourly progress, promoting enquiry, diffusing knowledge, strengthening the weak, and mollifying the hardened." †

In immediate connection with this subject is the argument that Dr. Paley places at the head of those which he advances in favor of religious establishments—that the knowledge and profession of Christianity cannot be upholden without a clergy supported by legal provision, and belonging to one sect of Christians. ‡ The justness of this proposition is founded upon the necessity of research. It is said that "Christianity is an historical religion," and that the truth of its history must be investigated ; that in order to vindicate its authority and to ascertain its truths, leisure and education and learning are indispensable—so that such an "order of clergy is necessary to perpetuate the evidences of revelation, and to interpret the obscurity of those ancient writings in which the religion is contained." To all this there is one plain objection, that when once the evidences of religion are adduced and made public, when once the obscurity of the ancient writings is interpreted, the work, so far as discovery is concerned, is done; and it can hardly be imagined that an established clergy is necessary in perpetuity to do that which in its own nature can be done but once. Whatever may have been the validity of this argument in other times, when few but the clergy possessed any learning, or when the evidences of religion had not been sought out, it possesses little validity now. These evidences are brought before the world in a form so clear and accessible to literary and good men, that, in the present state of society, there is little reason to fear they will be lost for want of an established church. Nor is it to be forgotten that with respect to our own country, the best defences of Christianity which exist in the language, have not been the work either of the established clergy or of members of the established church. The expression, that such "an order of clergy is necessary to perpetuate the evidences of revelation," appears to contain an illusion. Evidences can in no other sense be perpetuated than by being again and again brought before the public. If this be the meaning, it belongs rather to the teaching of religious truths than to their discovery; but it is upon the discovery, it is upon the opportunity of research, that the argument is founded: and it is particularly to be noticed, that this is the primary argument which Paley adduces in deciding "the first and most fundamental question upon the subject."

* Hall.

† Duncan's Trav. in America.

‡ See Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 6 c. 10.

It pleases Providence to employ human agency in the vindication and diffusion of his truth; but to employ the expression "the knowledge and profession of Christianity" cannot be upholden without an established clergy, approaches to irreverence. Even a rejector of Christianity says, "If public worship be conformable to reason, reason without doubt will prove adequate to its vindication and support. If it be from God it is profanation to imagine that it stands in need of the alliance of the state."* And it is clearly untrue in fact; because, without such a clergy, it is actually upheld, and because, during the three first centuries, the religion subsisted and spread and prospered without any encouragement from the state. And it is remarkable, too, that the diffusion of Christianity in our own times 'in pagan nations, is effected less by the clergy of established churches than by others. †

One particular manner in which the establishment of a church injures the character of the church itself is, by the temptation which it holds out to equivocation or hypocrisy. It is necessary to the preference of the teachers of a particular sect, that there should be some means of discovering who belong to that sect:—there must be some test. Before the man who is desirous of undertaking the ministerial office, there are placed two roads, one of which conducts to those privileges which a state religion enjoys, and the other does not. The latter may be entered by all who will: the former by those only who affirm their belief of the rectitude of some church forms or of some points of theology. It requires no argument to prove that this is to tempt men to affirm that which they do not believe: that it is to say to the man who does not believe the stipulated points, Here is money for you if you will violate your conscience. By some the invitation will be accepted ; * and what is the result? Why that, just as they are going publicly to insist upon the purity and sanctity of the moral law, they violate that law themselves. The injury which is thus done to a Christian church by establishing it, is negative as well as positive. You not only tempt some men to equivocation or hypocrisy, but exclude from the office others of sounder integrity. Two persons, both of whom do not assent to the prescribed points, are desirous of entering the church. One is upright and conscientious, the other subservient and unscrupulous. An establishment excludes the good man and admits the bad. "Though some purposes of order and tranquillity may be answered by the establishment of creeds and confessions, yet they are at all times attended with serious inconveniences : they check enquiry ; they violate liberty ; they ensnare the consciences of the clergy, by holding out temptations to prevarication." †

* Godwin's Pol. Just. 2, 608.

† In the preceding discussion, I have left out all reference to the proper qualification or appointment of Christian ministers, and have assumed (but without conceding) that the magistrate is at liberty to adjust those matters if he pleases.

And with respect to the habitual accommodation of the exercise of the ministry to the desires of the state it is manifest that an enlightened and faithful minister may frequently find himself restrained by a species of political leading-strings. He had not the full command of his intellectual and religious attainments. He may not perhaps communicate the whole counsel of God. ‡ It was formerly conceded to the English clergy that they might preach against the horrors and impolicy of war, * "Chillingworth declared in a letter to Dr. Sheldon, that if he subscribed he subscribed his own damnation, and yet in no long space of time he actually did subscribe to the articles of the church again and again." Simpson's plea.

† Paley : Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 6, c. 10.

‡ "Honest and disinterested boldness in the path of duty is one of the first requisites of a minister of the gospel." Gisborne. But how shall they be thus disinterested? Mem. in the MS.

provided they were not chaplains to regiments or in the navy. Conceded! Then if the state had pleased, it might have withheld the concession; and accordingly from some the state did withhold it. They were prohibited to preach against that, against which the apostles wrote! What would these apostles have said if a state had bidden them keep silence respecting the most unchristian custom in the world? They would have said, Whether we ought to obey God rather than man, judge ye. What would they have done? They would have gone away and preached against it as before. One question more should be asked—What would they have said to an alliance which thus brought the Christian minister under bondage to the state?

It is sufficiently manifest, that whatever tends to diminish the virtue, or to impeach the character, of the ministers of religion, must tend to diminish the influence of religion upon mankind. If the teacher is not good, we are not to expect goodness in the taught. If a man enters the church with impure or unworthy motives, he cannot do his duty when he is there. If he makes religion subservient to interest in his own practice, he cannot effectually teach others to make religion paramount to all. Men associate (they ought to do it less) the idea of religion with that of its teachers; and their respect for one is frequently measured by their respect for the other. Now, that the effect of religious establishments has been to depress their teachers in the estimation of mankind, cannot be disputed. The effect is, in truth, inevitable. And it is manifest that whatever conveys disrespectful ideas of religion diminishes its influence upon the human mind. In brief, we have seen that to establish a religion is morally pernicious to its ministers; and whatever is injurious to them diminishes the power of religion in the world.

Christianity is a religion of good-will and kind affections. Its essence, so far as the intercourse of society is concerned, is love. Whatever diminishes good-will and kind affections amongst Christians, attacks the essence of Christianity. Now, religious establishments do this. They generate ill-will, heart-burnings, animosities—those very things which our religion deprecates more almost than any other. It is obvious that if a fourth or a third of a community think they are unreasonably excluded from privileges which the other parts enjoy, feelings of jealousy or envy are likely to be generated. If the minority are obliged to pay to the support of a religion they disapprove, these feelings are likely to be exacerbated. They soon become reciprocal ; attacks are made by one party and repelled by another, till there arises an habitual sense of unkindness or ill-will.* The deduction from the practical influence of religion upon the minds of men which this effect of religious establishments occasions, is great. The evil, I trust, is diminishing in the world ;

* I once met with rather a grotesque definition of religious dissent, but it illustrates my proposition :—“Dissenterism”—that is, “systematic opposition to the established religion.”

“The placing all the religious sects (in America) upon an equal footing with respect to the government of the country, has effectually secured the peace of the community, at the same time that it has essentially promoted the interests of truth and virtue.”—Mem. Dr. Priestley, p. 175. Mem. in the MS.

Pennsylvania.—“Although there are so many sects and such a difference of religious opinions in this province, it is surprising the harmony which subsists among them ; they consider themselves as children of the same father, and live like brethren because they have the liberty of thinking like men ; to this pleasing harmony, in a great measure is to be attributed the rapid and flourishing state of Pennsylvania above all the other provinces.” Travels through the interior parts of North America, by an officer. 1791. Lond. The officer was Thomas Aubery, who was taken prisoner by the Americans. Mem. in the MS.

but then the diminution results, not from religious establishments, but from that power of Christianity which prevails against these evils.

III. Then as to the effect of religious establishments upon the civil welfare of a state—we know that the connection between religious and civil welfare is intimate and great. Whatever therefore diminishes the influence of religion upon a people, diminishes their general welfare. In addition, however, to this general consideration, there are some particular modes of the injurious effects of religious establishments which it may be proper to notice.

And, first, religious establishments are incompatible with complete religious liberty. This consideration we requested the reader to bear in mind when the question of religious liberty was discussed.* “If an establishment be right, religious liberty is not; and if religious liberty be right, an establishment is not.” Whatever arguments therefore exist to prove the rectitude of complete religious liberty, they prove at the same time the wrongness of religious establishments. Nor is this all; for it is the manifest tendency of these establishments to withhold an increase of religious liberty, even when on other grounds it would be granted. The secular interests of the state religion are set in array against an increase of liberty. If the established church allows other churches to approach more nearly to an equality with itself, its own relative eminence is diminished; and if by any means the state religion adds to its own privileges, it is by deducting from the privileges of the rest. The state religion is, besides, afraid to dismiss any part even of its confessedly useless privileges, lest, when an alteration is begun, it should not easily be stopped. And there is no reason to doubt that it is temporal rather than religious considerations—interest rather than Christianity—which now occasions restrictions and disabilities and tests.

* Essay 3, c. 4.

In conformity with these views, persecution has generally been the work of religious establishments. Indeed, some alliance or some countenance at least from the state is necessary to a systematic persecution. Popular outrage may persecute men on account of their religion, as it often has done; but fixed stated persecutions have perhaps always been the work of the religion of the state. It was the state religion of Rome that persecuted the first Christians; not to mention that it was the state religion of Judea that put our Saviour himself to death.—“Who was it that crucified the Saviour of the world for attempting to reform the religion of his country? The Jewish priesthood.—Who was it that drowned the altars of their idols with the blood of Christians for attempting to abolish paganism? The pagan priesthood.—Who was it that persecuted to flames and death those who, in the time of Wickliffe and his followers, labored to reform the errors of Popery? The Popish priesthood.—Who was it, and who is it that, both in England and in Ireland since the Reformation—but I check my hand, being unwilling to reflect upon the dead, or to exasperate the living.”* We also are unwilling to reflect upon or to exasperate, but our business is with plain truth. Who, then, was it that since the Reformation has persecuted dissentients from its creed, and who is it that at this hour thinks and speaks of them with unchristian antipathy? The English priesthood. It was, and it is, the state religion in some European countries that now persecutes dissenters from its creed. It was the state religion in this country that persecuted the Protestants; since Protestantism has been established, it is the state religion which has persecuted Protestant dissenters. Is this the fault principally of the faith of these churches, or of their alliance with the state? No man can be in doubt for an answer.

* Miscellaneous Tracts by Richard Watson, D. D., Bishop of Landaff, v. 2.

On the other hand, there are some advantages attendant on the voluntary system which that of a legal provision does not possess.

But this does not imply that even voluntary payment is conformable with the dignity of the Christian ministry, with its usefulness, or with the requisitions of the Christian law.

And here I am disposed, in the outset, to acknowledge that the question of payment is involved in an antecedent question—the necessary qualifications of a Christian minister. If one of these necessary qualifications be, that he should devote his youth and early manhood to theological studies, or to studies or exercises of any kind, I do not perceive how the propriety of voluntary payment can be disputed; for, when a man who might otherwise have fitted himself, in a counting-house or an office, for procuring his after-support, employs his time necessarily in qualifying himself for a Christian instructor, it is indispensable that he should be paid for his instructions. Or if, after he has assumed the ministerial function, it be his indispensable business to devote all or the greater portion of his time to studies or other preparations for the pulpit, the same necessity remains. He must be paid for his ministry, because, in order to be a minister, he is prevented from maintaining himself.

But the necessary qualifications of a minister of the gospel cannot here be discussed. We pass on, therefore, with the simple expression of the sentiment, that how beneficial soever a theological education and theological enquiries may be in the exercise of the office, yet that they form no necessary qualifications;—that men may be, and that some are, true and sound ministers of that gospel, without them.

Now, in enquiring into the Christian character and tendency of payment for preaching Christianity, one position will perhaps be recognized as universally true—that if the same ability and zeal in the exercise of the ministry could be attained without payment as with it, the payment might reasonably and rightly be forborne. Nor will it perhaps be disputed, that if Christian teachers of the present day were possessed of some good portion of the qualifications, and were actuated by the motives of the first teachers of our religion, stated remuneration would not be needed. If love for mankind, and the “ability which God giveth,” were strong enough to induce and to enable men to preach the gospel without payment, the employment of money as a motive would be without use or propriety. Remuneration is a contrivance adapted to an imperfect state of the Christian church:—nothing but imperfection can make it needful; and, when that imperfection shall be removed, it will cease to be needful again.

These considerations would lead us to expect, even antecedently to enquiry, that some ill effects are attendant upon the system of remuneration. Respecting these effects, one of the advocates of a legal provision holds language which, though it be much too strong, nevertheless contains much truth. “Upon the voluntary plan,” says Dr. Paley, “preaching, in time, would become a mode of begging. With what sincerity or with what dignity can a preacher dispense the truths of Christianity, whose thoughts are perpetually solicited to the reflection how he may increase his subscription? His eloquence, if he possess any, resembles rather the exhibition of a player who is computing the profits of his theatre, than the simplicity of a man who, feeling himself the awful expectations of religion, is seeking to bring others to such a sense and undertaking of their duty as may save their souls.—He, not only whose success but whose subsistence depends upon collecting and pleasing a crowd, must resort to other arts than the acquirement and communication of sober and profitable instruction. For a preacher to be thus at the mercy of his audience, to be obliged to adapt his doctrines to the pleasure of a capricious multitude, to be continually affecting a style and manner neither natural to him nor agreeable to his judgment, to live in constant bondage to tyrannical and insolent directors, are circumstances so mortifying not only to the pride of the human heart but to the virtuous love of independency, that they are rarely submitted to without a sacrifice of principle and a depravation of character ;—at least it may be pronounced, that a ministry so degraded would soon fall into the lowest hands ; for it would be found impossible to engage men of worth and ability in so precarious and humiliating a profession.”*

To much of this it is a sufficient answer, that the predictions are contradicted by the fact. Of those teachers who are supported by voluntary subscriptions, it is not true that their eloquence resembles the exhibition of a player who is computing the profits of his theatre ; for the fact is, that a very large proportion of them assiduously devote themselves from better motives to the religious benefit of their flocks :—it is not true that the office is rarely undertaken without what can be called a depravation of character ; for the character, both religious and moral, of those teachers who are voluntarily paid, is at least as exemplary as that of those who are paid by provision of the state :—it is not true that the office falls into the lowest hands, and that it is impossible to engage men of worth and ability in the profession, because very many of such men are actually engaged in it.

* Mor. and Pol. Phil. b. 6, c. 10.

But although the statements of the Archdeacon are not wholly true, they are true in part. Preaching will become a mode of begging. When a congregation wants a preacher, and we see a man get into the pulpit expressly and confessedly to show how he can preach, in order that the hearers may consider how they like him, and when one object of his thus doing is confessedly to obtain an income, there is reason—not certainly for speaking of him as a beggar—but for believing that the dignity and freedom of the gospel are sacrificed.—Thoughts perpetually solicited to the reflection how he may increase his subscription. Supposing this to be the language of exaggeration, supposing the increase of his subscription to be his subordinate concern, yet still it is his concern, and being his concern, it is his temptation. It is to be feared, that by the influence of this temptation his sincerity and his independence may be impaired, that the consideration of what his hearers wish rather than of what he thinks they need, may prompt him to sacrifice his conscience to his profit, and to add or to deduct something from the counsel of God. Such temptation necessarily exists; and it were only to exhibit ignorance of the motives of human conduct to deny that it will sometimes prevail.—To live in constant bondage to insolent and tyrannical directors. It is not necessary to suppose that directors will be tyrannical or insolent, nor by consequence to suppose that the preacher is in a state of constant bondage. But if they be not tyrants and he a slave, they may be masters and he a servant; a servant in a sense far different from that in which the Christian minister is required to be a servant of the Church—in a sense which implies an undue subserviency of his ministrations to the will of men, and which is incompatible with the obligation to have no master but Christ.

Other modes of voluntary payment may be and perhaps they are adopted, but the effect will not be essentially different. Subscriptions may be collected from a number of congregations and thrown into a common fund, which fund may be appropriated by a directory or conference : but the objections still apply ; for he who wishes to obtain an income as a preacher, has then to try to propitiate the directory instead of a congregation, and the temptation to sacrifice his independence and his conscience remains.

There is no way of obtaining emancipation from this subjection, no way of avoiding this temptation, but by a system in which the Christian ministry is absolutely free.

But the ill effects of thus paying preachers are not confined to those who preach. The habitual consciousness that the preacher is paid, and the notion which some men take no pains to separate from this consciousness, that he preaches because he is paid, have a powerful tendency to diminish the influence of his exhortations, and the general effect of his labors. The vulgarly irreligious think, or pretend to think, that it is a sufficient excuse for disregarding these labors to say, They are a matter of course—preachers must say something, because it is their trade. And it is more than to be feared that notions, the same in kind however different in extent, operate upon a large proportion of the community. It is not probable that it should be otherwise ; and thus it is that a continual deduction is made by the hearer from the preacher's disinterestedness or sincerity, and a continual deduction therefore from the effect of his labors.

How seldom can such a pastor say, with full demonstration of sincerity, "I seek not yours, but you."

The flock may indeed be, and happily it often is, his first and greatest motive to exertion ; but the demonstrative evidence that it is so, can only be afforded by those whose ministrations are absolutely free. The deduction which is thus made from the practical influence of the labors of stipended preachers, is the same in kind (though differing in amount) as that which is made from a pleader's addresses in court. He pleads because he is paid for pleading. Who does not perceive, that if an able man came forward and pleaded in a cause without a retainer, and simply from the desire that justice should be awarded, he would be listened to with much more of confidence, and that his arguments would have much more weight, than if the same words were uttered by a barrister who was fee'd? A similar deduction is made from the writings of paid ministers especially if they advocate their own particular faith. "He is interested evidence," says the reader—he has got a retainer, and of course argues for his client ; and thus arguments that may be invincible, and facts that may be incontrovertibly true, lose some portion of their effect, even upon virtuous men, and a large portion upon the bad, because the preacher is paid. If, as is sometimes the case, "the amount of the salary given is regulated very precisely by the frequency of the ministry required,"—so that a hearer may possibly allow the reflection, The preacher will get half a guinea for the sermon he is going to preach—it is almost impossible that the dignity of the Christian ministry should not be reduced, as well as that the influence of his exhortations should not be diminished. "It is however more desirable," says Milton, "for example to be, and for the preventing of offence or suspicion, as well as more noble and honorable in itself, and conducive to our more complete glorying in God, to render an unpaid service to the church, in this as well as in all other instances ; and, after the example of our Lord, to minister and serve gratuitously."*

Some ministers expend all the income which they derive from their office in acts of beneficence. To these we may safely appeal for confirmation of these remarks. Do you not find that the consciousness, in the minds of your hearers, that you gain nothing by your labor, greatly increases its influence upon them? Do you not find that they listen to you with more confidence and regard, and more willingly admit the truths which you inculcate and conform to the advices which you impart? If these things be so—and who will dispute it?—how great must be the aggregate obstruction which pecuniary remuneration opposes to the influence of religion in the world.

---

But indeed it is not practicable to the writer to illustrate the whole of what he conceives to be the truth upon this subject, without a brief advertence to the qualifications of the minister of the gospel ; because, if his view of these qualifications be just, the stipulation for such and such exercise of the ministry, and such and such payment is impossible. If it is "admitted that the ministry of the gospel is the work of the Lord, that it can be rightly exercised only in virtue of his appointment," and only when "a necessity is laid upon the minister to preach the gospel,"—it is manifest that he cannot engage beforehand to preach when others desire it. It is manifest, that "the compact which binds the minister to preach on the condition that his hearers shall pay him for his preaching, assumes the character of absolute inconsistency with the spirituality of the Christian religion." †

* Christian Doctrine : p. 484.

† I would venture to suggest to some of those to whom these considerations are offered, whether the notion that a preacher is “ Freely ye have received, freely give.” When we contemplate a Christian minister who illustrates, both in his commission and in his practice, this language of his Lord ; who teaches, advises, reproveth, with the authority and affection of a commissioned teacher ; who fears not to displease his hearers, and desires not to receive their reward ; who is under no temptation to withhold, and does not withhold, any portion of that counsel which he thinks God designs for his church ;—when we contemplate such a man, we may feel somewhat of thankfulness and of joy ;—of thankfulness and joy that the Universal Parent thus enables his creatures to labor for the good of one another, in that same spirit in which He cares for them and blesses them himself.

I censure not, either in word or in thought, him who, in sincerity of mind, accepts remuneration for his labors in the church. It may not be inconsistent with the dispensations of Providence, that in the present imperfect condition of the Christian family, imperfect principles respecting the ministry should be permitted to prevail : nor is it to be questioned that some of those who do receive remuneration, are fulfilling their proper a sine qua non of the exercise of public worship, is not taken up without sufficient consideration of the principles which it involves. If, “ where two or three are gathered together in the name ” of Christ, there He, the minister of the sanctuary, is “ in the midst of them,” it surely cannot be necessary to the exercises of such worship, that another preacher should be there. Surely, too, it derogates something from the excellence, something from the glory of the Christian dispensation, to assume that, if a number of Christians should be so situated as to be without a preacher, there the public worship of God cannot be performed. This may often happen in remote places, in voyages or the like : and I have sometimes been impressed with the importance of these considerations when I have heard a person say, “ ..... is absent, and therefore there will be no Divine service this morning.”

allotments in the universal church. But this does not evince that we should not anticipate the arrival, and promote the extension, of a more perfect state. It does not evince that a higher allotment may not await their successors—that days of greater purity and brightness may not arrive ;—of purity, when every motive of the Christian minister shall be simply Christian ; and of brightness, when the light of truth shall be displayed with greater effulgence. When the Great Parent of all shall thus turn his favor towards his people : when He shall supply them with teachers exclusively of his own appointment, it will be perceived that the ordinary present state of the Christian ministry is adapted only to the twilight of the Christian day ; and some of those who now faithfully labor in this hour of twilight will be amongst the first to rejoice in the greater glory of the noon.

---

CHAPTER IX.

PATRIOTISM.

Patriotism as it is viewed by Christianity—A Patriotism which is opposed to general benignity—Patriotism not the soldier's motive.

WE are presented with a beautiful subject of contemplation, when we discover that the principles which Christianity advances upon its own authority, are recommended and enforced by their practical adaptation to the condition and the wants of man. With such a subject I think we are presented in the case of patriotism.

“ Christianity does not encourage particular patriotism in opposition to general benignity.”* If it did, it would not be adapted for the world. The duties of the subject of one state would often be in opposition to those of the subject of another, and men might inflict evil or misery upon neighbor nations in conforming to the Christian law. Christianity is designed to benefit, not a community, but the world. The promotion of the interests of one community by injuring another—that is, “patriotism in opposition to general benignity,”—it utterly rejects as wrong; and in doing this, it does that which in a system of such wisdom and benevolence we should expect.—“The love of our country,” says Adam Smith, “seems not to be derived from the love of mankind.”*

* Bishop Watson.

I do not mean to say that the word patriotism is to be found in the New Testament, or that it contains any disquisitions respecting the proper extent of the love of our country—but I say that the universality of benevolence which Christianity inculcates, both in its essential character and in its precepts, is incompatible with that patriotism which would benefit our own community at the expense of general benevolence. Patriotism, as it is often advocated, is a low and selfish principle, a principle wholly unworthy of that enlightened and expanded philanthropy which religion proposes.

Nevertheless Christianity appears not to encourage the doctrine of being a “citizen of the world,” and of paying no more regard to our own community than to every other. And why? Because such a doctrine is not rational; because it opposes the exercise of natural and virtuous feelings; and because, if it were attempted to be reduced to practice, it may be feared that it would destroy confined benignity without effecting a counterbalancing amount of universal philanthropy.

* Theo. Mor. Sent. The limitation with which this opinion should be regarded, we shall presently propose.

This preference of our own nation is indicated in that strong language of Paul, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites."* And a similar sentiment is inculcated by the admonition—"As we have therefore, opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith."† In another place the same sentiment is applied to more private life;—"If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith."‡

All this is perfectly consonant with reason and with nature. Since the helpless and those who need assistance must obtain it somewhere, where can they so rationally look for it, where shall they look for it at all, except from those with whom they are connected in society? If these do not exercise benignity towards them, who will? And as to the dictate of nature, it is a law of nature that a man shall provide for his own. He is prompted to do this by the impulse of nature. Who, indeed, shall support, and cherish, and protect a child if his parents do not? That speculative philosophy is vain which would supplant these dictates by doctrines of general philanthropy. It cannot be applicable to human affairs until there is an alteration in the human constitution. Not only religion therefore, but reason and nature, reject that philosophy which teaches that no man should prefer or aid another because he is his countryman, his neighbor, or his child:—for even this, the philosophy has taught us; and we have been seriously told that, in pursuance of general philanthropy, we ought not to cherish or support our own offspring in preference to other children. The effect of these doctrines, if they were reduced to practice, would be, not to diffuse universal benevolence, but to contract or destroy the charities of men for their families, their neighbors, and their country. It is an idle system of philosophy which sets out with extinguishing those principles of human nature which the Creator has implanted for wise and good ends. He that shall so far succeed in practising this philosophy as to look with indifference upon his parent, his wife, and his son, will not often be found with much zeal to exercise kindness and benevolence to the world at large.

* Rom. ix. 3.

† Gal. vi. 10.

‡ 1 Tim. v. 8.

Christianity rejects alike the extravagance of patriotism and the extravagance of seeming philanthropy. Its precepts are addressed to us as men with human constitutions, and as men in society. But to cherish and support my own child rather than others; to do good to my neighbors rather than to strangers; to benefit my own country rather than another nation, does not imply that we may injure other nations, or strangers, of their children, in order to do good to our own. Here is the point for discrimination—a point which vulgar patriotism and vulgar philosophy have alike overlooked.

The proper mode in which patriotism should be exercised is that which does not necessarily respect other nations. He is the truest patriot who benefits his own country without diminishing the welfare of another. For which reason, those who induce improvements in the administration of justice, in the maxims of governing, in the political constitution of the state—or those who extend and rectify the education, or in any other manner amend the moral or social condition of a people, possess incomparably higher claims to the praise of patriotism than multitudes of those who receive it from the popular voice.

That patriotism which is manifested in political partizanship, is frequently of a very questionable kind. The motives to this partizanship are often far other than the love of our country, even when the measure which a party pursues tends to the country's good; and many are called patriots, of whom both the motives and the actions are pernicious or impure. The most vulgar and unfounded talk of patriotism is that which relates to the agents of military operations. In general, the patriotism is of a kind which Christianity condemns; because it is "in opposition to general benignity." It does more harm to another country than good to our own. In truth, the merit often consists in the harm that is done to another country, with but little pretensions to benefiting our own. These agents therefore, if they were patriotic at all, would commonly be so in an unchristian sense.

Upon the whole, we shall act both safely and wisely in lowering the relative situation of patriotism in the scale of Christian virtues. It is a virtue; but it is far from the greatest or the highest. The world has given to it an unwarranted elevation—an elevation to which it has no pretensions in the view of truth; and if the friends of truth consign it to its proper station, it is probable that there will be fewer spurious pretensions to its praise.

CHAPTER X.

WAR.

CAUSES OF WAR.—Want of enquiry : Indifference to human misery : National irritability : Interest : Secret motives of Cabinets : Ideas of glory—Foundation of military glory.

CONSEQUENCES OF WAR.—Destruction of human life : Taxation : Moral depravity : Familiarity with plunder : Implicit submission to superiors : Resignation of moral agency : Bondage and degradation—Loan of armies—Effects on the community.

LAWFULNESS OF WAR.—Influence of habit—Of appealing to antiquity—The Christian Scriptures—Subjects of Christ's benediction—Matt. xxvi. 52.—The Apostles and Evangelists—The Centurion—Cornelius—Silence not a proof of approbation—Luke xxii. 36.—John the Baptist—Negative evidence—Prophecies of the old Testament—The requisitions of Christianity of present obligation—Primitive Christians—Example and testimony of early Christians—Christian soldiers—Wars of the Jews—Duties of individuals and nations—Offensive and defensive war—Wars always aggressive—Paley—War wholly forbidden.

OF THE PROBABLE PRACTICAL EFFECTS OF ADHERING TO THE MORAL LAW IN RESPECT TO WAR.—Quakers in America and Ireland—Colonization of Pennsylvania—Unconditional reliance on Providence—Recapitulation—General Observations.

It is one amongst the numerous moral phenomena of the present times, that the enquiry is silently yet not slowly spreading in the world—Is war compatible with the Christian religion? There was a period when the question was seldom asked, and when war was regarded almost by every man both as inevitable and right. That period has certainly passed away ; and not only individuals but public societies, and societies in distant nations, are urging the question upon the attention of mankind. The simple circumstance that it is thus urged contains no irrational motive to investigation : for why should men ask the question if they did not doubt ; and how, after these long ages of prescription, could they begin to doubt, without a reason ?

It is not unworthy of remark, that whilst disquisitions are frequently issuing from the press, of which the tendency is to show that war is not compatible with Christianity, few serious attempts are made to show that it is. Whether this results from the circumstance that no individual peculiarly is interested in the proof—or that there is a secret consciousness that proof cannot be brought—or that those who may be desirous of defending the custom, rest in security that the impotence of its assailants will be of no avail against a custom so established and so supported—I do not know ; yet the fact is remarkable, that scarcely a defender is to be found. It cannot be doubted that the question is one of the utmost interest and importance to man. Whether the custom be defensible or not, every man should enquire into its consistency with the moral law. If it is defensible he may, by enquiry, dismiss the scruples which it is certain subsist in the minds of multitudes, and thus exempt himself from the offence of participating in that which, though pure, he “esteemeth to be unclean.” If it is not defensible, the propriety of investigation is increased in a tenfold degree.

It may be a subject therefore of reasonable regret to the friends and the lovers of truth, that the question of the moral lawfulness of war is not brought fairly before the public. I say fairly : because though many of the publications which impugn its lawfulness advert to the ordinary arguments in its favor, yet it is not to be assumed that they give to those arguments all that vigor and force which would be imparted by a stated and an able advocate. Few books, it is probable, would tend more powerfully to promote the discovery and dissemination of truth, than one which should frankly and fully and ably advocate, upon sound moral principles, the practice of war. The public would then see the whole of what can be urged in its favor without being obliged to seek for arguments, as they now must, in incidental or imperfect or scattered disquisitions : and possessing in a distinct form the evidence of both parties, they would be enabled to judge justly between them. Perhaps if, invited as the public are to the discussion, no man is hereafter willing to adventure in the cause, the conclusion will not be unreasonable, that no man is destitute of a consciousness that the cause is not a good one.

Meantime it is the business of him whose enquiries have conducted him to the conclusion that the cause is not good, to exhibit the evidence upon which the conclusion is founded. It happens upon the subject of war, more than upon almost any other subject of human enquiry, that the individual finds it difficult to contemplate its merits with an uninfluenced mind. He finds it difficult to examine it as it would be examined by a philosopher to whom the subject was new. He is familiar with its details ; he is habituated to the idea of its miseries ; he has perhaps never doubted, because he has never questioned, its rectitude ; nay, he has associated with it ideas not of splendor only but of honor and of merit. That such an enquirer will not, without some effort of abstraction, examine the question with impartiality and justice, is plain ; and therefore the first business of him who would satisfy his mind respecting the lawfulness of war, is to divest himself of all those habits of thought and feeling which have been the result not of reflection and judgment, but of the ordinary associations of life. And perhaps he may derive some assistance in this necessary but not easy dismissal of previous opinions, by referring first to some of the ordinary causes and consequences of war. The reference will enable us also more satisfactorily to estimate the moral character of the practice itself : for is no unimportant auxiliary in forming such an estimate of human actions or opinions, to know how they have been produced and what are their effects.

CAUSES OF WAR.

Of these causes one undoubtedly consists in the want of enquiry. We have been accustomed from earliest life to a familiarity with its "pomp and circumstance;" soldiers have passed us at every step, and battles and victories have been the topic of every one around us. It therefore becomes familiarized to all our thoughts and interwoven with all our associations. We have never enquired whether these things should be: the question does not even suggest itself. We acquiesce in it, as we acquiesce in the rising of the sun without any other idea than that it is a part of the ordinary process of the world. And how are we to feel disapprobation of a system that we do not examine, and of the nature of which we do not think? Want of enquiry has been the means by which long-continued practices, whatever has been their enormity, have obtained the general concurrence of the world, and by which they have continued to pollute or degrade it, long after the few who enquire into their nature have discovered them to be bad. It was by these means that the slave trade was so long tolerated by this land of humanity. Men did not think of its iniquity. We were induced to think, and we soon abhorred, and then abolished it. Of the effects of this want of enquiry we have indeed frequent examples upon the subject before us. Many who have all their lives concluded that war is lawful and right, have found, when they began to examine the question, that their conclusions were founded upon no evidence;—that they had believed in its rectitude not because they had possessed themselves of proof, but because they had never enquired whether it was capable of proof or not. In the present moral state of the world, one of the first concerns of him who would discover pure morality should be, to question the purity of that which now obtains.

Another cause of our complacency with war, and therefore another cause of war itself, consists in that callousness to human misery which the custom induces. They who are shocked at a single murder on the highway, hear with indifference of the slaughter of a thousand on the field. They whom the idea of a single corpse would thrill with terror, contemplate that of heaps of human carcasses mangled by human hands, with frigid indifference. If a murder is committed, the narrative is given in the public newspaper, with many adjectives of horror—with many expressions of commiseration, and many hopes that the perpetrator will be detected. In the next paragraph, the editor, perhaps, tells us that he has hurried a second edition to the press, in order that he may be the first to glad the public with the intelligence, that in an engagement which has just taken place, eight hundred and fifty of the enemy were killed. Now, is not this latter intelligence eight hundred and fifty times as deplorable as the first? Yet the first is the subject of our sorrow, and this—of our joy! The inconsistency and disproportionateness which has been occasioned in our sentiments of benevolence, offers a curious moral phenomenon.*

* Part of the Declaration and Oath prescribed to be taken by Catholics is this: "I do solemnly declare before God, that I believe that no act in itself unjust, immoral, or wicked, can ever be justified or excused by or under pretence or color that it was done either for the good of the church or in obedience to

The immolations of the Hindoos fill us with compassion or horror, and we are zealously laboring to prevent them. The sacrifices of life by our own criminal executions, are the subject of our anxious commiseration, and we are strenuously endeavoring to diminish their number. We feel that the life of a Hindoo or a malefactor is a serious thing, and that nothing but imperious necessity should induce us to destroy the one, or to permit the destruction of the other. Yet what are these sacrifices of life in comparison with the sacrifices of war? In the late campaign in Russia, there fell, during one hundred and seventy-three days in succession, an average of two thousand nine hundred men per day: more than five hundred thousand human beings in less than six months! And most of any ecclesiastical power whatsoever." This declaration is required as a solemn act, and is supposed, of course, to involve a great and sacred principle of rectitude. We propose the same declaration to be taken by military men, with the alteration of two words. "I do solemnly declare before God, that I believe that no act in itself unjust, immoral, or wicked, can ever be justified or excused by or under pretence or color that it was done either for the good of the state or in obedience to any military power whatsoever." How would this declaration assort with the customary practice of the soldier? Put state for church, and military for ecclesiastical, and then the world thinks that acts in themselves most unjust, immoral, and wicked, are not only justified and excused, but very meritorious: for in the whole system of warfare, justice and morality are utterly disregarded. Are those who approve of this Catholic declaration conscious of the grossness of their own inconsistency? Or will they tell us that the interests of the state are so paramount to those of the church, that what would be wickedness in the service of one, is virtue in the service of the other? The truth we suppose to be, that so intense is the power of public opinion, that of the thousands who approve the Catholic declarations and the practices of war, there are scarcely tens who even perceive their own inconsistency.—Mem. in the MS.

these victims expired with peculiar intensity of suffering. We are carrying our benevolence to the Indies, but what becomes of it in Russia, or at Leipsic? We are laboring to save a few lives from the gallows, but where is our solicitude to save them on the field? Life is life wheresoever it be sacrificed, and has every where equal claims to our regard. I am not now saying that war is wrong, but that we regard its miseries with an indifference with which we regard no others: that if our sympathy were reasonably excited respecting them, we should be powerfully prompted to avoid war; and that the want of this reasonable and virtuous sympathy, is one cause of its prevalence in the world.

And another consists in national irritability. It is assumed (not indeed upon the most rational grounds) that the best way of supporting the dignity, and maintaining the security of a nation is, when occasions of disagreement arise, to assume a high attitude and a fearless tone. We keep ourselves in a state of irritability which is continually alive to occasions of offence; and he that is prepared to be offended readily finds offences. A jealous sensibility sees insults and injuries where sober eyes see nothing, and nations thus surround themselves with a sort of artificial tentacula, which they throw wide in quest of irritation, and by which they are stimulated to revenge by every touch of accident or inadvertency. They who are easily offended will also easily offend. What is the experience of private life? The man who is always on the alert to discover trespasses on his honor or his rights, never fails to quarrel with his neighbors. Such a person may be dreaded as a torpedo. We may fear, but we shall not love him; and fear, without love, easily lapses into enmity. There are, therefore, many feuds and litigations in the life of such a man, that would never have disturbed its quiet if he had not captiously snarled at the trespasses of accident, and savagely retaliated insignificant injuries. The viper that we chance to molest, we suffer to live if he continue to be quiet; but if he raise himself in menaces of destruction we knock him on the head.

It is with nations as with men. If on every offence we fly to arms, we shall of necessity provoke exasperation; and if we exasperate a people as petulant as ourselves we may probably continue to butcher one another, until we cease only from emptiness of exchequers or weariness of slaughter. To threaten war, is therefore often equivalent to beginning it. In the present state of men's principles, it is not probable that one nation will observe another levying men, and building ships, and founding cannon, without providing men, and ships, and cannon themselves; and when both are thus threatening and defying, what is the hope that there will not be a war?

If nations fought only when they could not be at peace, there would be very little fighting in the world. The wars that are waged for "insults to flags," and an endless train of similar motives, are perhaps generally attributable to the irritability of our pride. We are at no pains to appear pacific towards the offender: our remonstrance is a threat; and the nation which would give satisfaction to an enquiry, will give no other answer to a menace than a menace in return. At length we begin to fight, not because we are aggrieved, but because we are angry. One example may be offered: "In 1789, a small Spanish vessel committed some violence in Nootka Sound, under the pretence that the country belonged to Spain. This appears to have been the principal ground of offence; and with this both the government and the people of England were very angry. The irritability and haughtiness which they manifested were unaccountable to the Spaniards, and the peremptory tone was imputed by Spain, not to the feelings of offended dignity and violated justice, but to some lurking enmity, and some secret designs which we did not choose to avow."* If the tone had been less peremptory and more rational, no such suspicion would have been excited, and the hostility which was consequent upon the suspicion would, of course, have been avoided. Happily the English were not so passionate, but that before they proceeded to fight they negotiated, and settled the affair amicably. The preparations for this foolish war cost, however, three millions one hundred and thirty-three thousand pounds !

So well indeed is national irritability known to be an efficient cause of war, that they who from any motive wish to promote it, endeavor to rouse the temper of a people by stimulating their passions—just as the boys in our streets stimulate two dogs to fight. These persons talk of the insults, or the encroachments, or the contempts of the destined enemy, with every artifice of aggravation ; they tell us of foreigners who want to trample upon our rights, of rivals who ridicule our power, of foes who will crush, and of tyrants who will enslave us. They pursue their object, certainly, by efficacious means : they desire a war, and therefore irritate our passions ; and when men are angry they are easily persuaded to fight.

That this cause of war is morally bad—that petulance and irritability are wholly incompatible with Christianity, these pages have repeatedly shown.

Wars are often promoted from considerations of interest, as well as from passion. The love of gain adds its influence to our other motives to support them ; and without other motives, we know that this love is sufficient to give great obliquity to the moral judgment, and tempt us to many crimes. During a war of ten years there will always be many whose income depends on its continuance ; and a countless host of commissaries, and purveyors, and agents, and mechanics, commend a war because it fills their pockets. And unhappily, if money is in prospect, the desolation of a kingdom is often of little concern : destruction and slaughter are not to be put in competition with a hundred a-year. In truth, it seems sometimes to be the system of the conductors of a war, to give to the sources of gain endless ramifications. The more there are who profit by it the more numerous are its supporters ; and thus the projects of a cabinet become identified with the wishes of a people, and both are gratified in the prosecution of war.

* Smollett's England.

A support more systematic and powerful is however given to war, because it offers to the higher ranks of society a profession which unites gentility with profit, and which, without the vulgarity of trade maintains or enriches them. It is of little consequence to enquire whether the distinction of vulgarity between the toils of war and the toils of commerce be fictitious. In the abstract, it is fictitious ; but of this species of reputation public opinion holds the arbitrium et jus et norma ; and public opinion is in favor of war.

The army and the navy, therefore, afford to the middle and higher classes a most acceptable profession. The profession of arms is like the profession of law or physic—a regular source of employment and profit. Boys are educated for the army as they are educated for the bar ; and parents appear to have no other idea than that war is part of the business of the world. Of younger sons, whose fathers in pursuance of the unhappy system of primogeniture, do not choose to support them at the expense of the heir, the army and the navy are the common resource. They would not know what to do without them. To many of these the news of a peace is a calamity ; and though they may not lift their voices in favor of new hostilities for the sake of gain, it is unhappily certain that they often secretly desire it.

It is in this manner that much of the rank, the influence, and the wealth of a country become interested in the promotion of wars ; and when a custom is promoted by wealth, and influence, and rank, what is the wonder that it should be continued ? It is said, (if my memory serves me, by Sir Walter Raleigh,) “ he that taketh up his rest to live by this profession shall hardly be an honest man.”

By depending upon war for a subsistence, a powerful inducement is given to desire it ; and when the question of war is to be decided, it is to be feared that the whispers of interest will prevail, and that humanity, and religion, and conscience will be sacrificed to promote it.

Of those causes of war which consist in the ambition of princes or statesmen or commanders, it is not necessary to speak, because no one to whom the world will listen is willing to defend them.

Statesmen however have, besides ambition, many purposes of nice policy which make wars convenient : and when they have such purposes, they are sometimes cool speculators in the lives of men. They who have much patronage have many dependents, and they who have many dependents have much power. By a war, thousands become dependent on a minister ; and if he be disposed, he can often pursue schemes of guilt, and intrench himself in unpunished wickedness, because the war enables him to silence the clamor of opposition by an office, and to secure the suffrages of venality by a bribe. He has therefore many motives to war—in ambition, that does not refer to conquest ; or in fear, that extends only to his office or his pocket : and fear or ambition, are sometimes more interesting considerations than the happiness and the lives of men. Cabinets have in truth, many secret motives to wars of which the people know little. They talk in public of invasions of right, of breaches of treaty, of the support of honor, of the necessity of retaliation, when these motives have no influence on their determinations. Some untold purpose of expediency, or the private quarrel of a prince or the pique or anger of a minister, are often the real motives to a contest, whilst its promoters are loudly talking of the honor or the safety of the country.

But perhaps the most operative cause of the popularity of war, and of the facility with which we engage in it, consists in this ; that an idea of glory is attached to military exploits, and of honor to the military profession. The glories of battle, and of those who perish in it, or who return in triumph to their country, are favorite topics of declamation with the historian, the biographer, and the poet. They have told us a thousand times of dying heroes, who “resign their lives amidst the joys of conquest, and, filled with their country’s glory, smile in death ;” and thus every excitement that eloquence and genius can command, is employed to arouse that ambition of fame which can be gratified only at the expense of blood.

Into the nature and principles of this fame and glory we have already enquired ; and in the view alike of virtue and of intellect, they are low and bad.* “Glory is the most selfish of all passions except love.”†—“I cannot tell how or why the love of glory is a less selfish principle than the love of riches.”‡ Philosophy and intellect may therefore well despise it, and Christianity silently, yet emphatically, condemns it. "Christianity," says Bishop Watson, "quite annihilates the disposition for martial glory." Another testimony, and from an advocate of war, goes further—No part of the heroic character is the subject of the "commendation, or precepts, or example of Christ;" but the character the most opposite to the heroic is the subject of them all.*

* See Essay II, c. 10. † West. Rev. No. I, for 1827.

‡ Mem. and Rem. of the late Jane Taylor.

Such is the foundation of the glory which has for so many ages deceived and deluded multitudes of mankind! Upon this foundation a structure has been raised so vast, so brilliant, so attractive, that the greater portion of mankind are content to gaze in admiration, without any inquiry into its basis or any solicitude for its durability. If, however, it should be, that the gorgeous temple will be able to stand only till Christian truth and light become predominant, it surely will be wise of those who seek a niche in its apartments as their paramount and final good, to pause ere they proceed. If they desire a reputation that shall outlive guilt and fiction, let them look to the basis of military fame. If this fame should one day sink into oblivion and contempt, it will not be the first instance in which widespread glory has been found to be a glittering bubble, that has burst and been forgotten. Look at the days of chivalry. Of the ten thousand Quixotes of the middle ages, where is now the honor or the fame? yet poets once sang their praises, and the chronicler of their achievements believed he was recording an everlasting fame. Where are now the glories of the tournament? glories

"Of which all Europe rang from side to side."

Where is the champion whom princesses caressed and nobles envied? Where are now the triumphs of Duns

* Paley : Evidences of Christianity, p. 2, c. 2.

Scotus, and where are the folios that perpetuated his fame? The glories of war have indeed outlived these ; human passions are less mutable than human follies ; but I am willing to avow my conviction, that these glories are alike destined to sink into forgetfulness ; and that the time is approaching when the applauses of heroism, and the splendors of conquest, will be remembered only as follies and iniquities that are past. Let him who seeks for fame, other than that which an era of Christian purity will allow, make haste ; for every hour that he delays its acquisition will shorten its duration. This is certain if there be certainty in the promises of heaven.

Of this factitious glory as a cause of war, Gibbon speaks in the Decline and Fall. “As long as mankind,” says he, “shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters.” “’Tis strange to imagine,” says the Earl of Shaftesbury, that war, which of all things appears the most savage, should be the passion of the most heroic spirits.”—But he gives us the reason.—“By a small misguidance of the affection, a lover of mankind becomes a ravager ; a hero and deliverer becomes an oppressor and destroyer.”*

These are amongst the great perpetual causes of war. And what are they? First, that we do not enquire whether war is right or wrong. Secondly, That we are habitually haughty and irritable in our intercourse with other nations. Thirdly, That war is a source of profit to individuals, and establishes professions which are very convenient to the middle and higher ranks of life. Fourthly, That it gratifies the ambition of public men, and serves the purposes of state policy. Fifthly, that notions of glory are attached to warlike affairs ; which glory is factitious and impure.

* Essay on the Freedom of Wit and Humor.

In the view of reason, and especially in the view of religion, what is the character of these causes? Are they pure? Are they honorable? Are they, when connected with their effects, compatible with the moral law?—Lastly, and especially, is it probable that a system of which these are the great ever-during causes, can itself be good or right?

CONSEQUENCES OF WAR.

To expatiate upon the miseries which war brings upon mankind, appears a trite and a needless employment. We all know that its evils are great and dreadful. Yet the very circumstance that the knowledge is familiar, may make it unoperative upon our sentiments and our conduct. It is not the intensity of misery, it is not the extent of evil alone, which is necessary to animate us to that exertion which evil and misery should excite ; if it were, surely we should be much more averse than we now are to contribute, in word or in action, to the promotion of war.

But there are mischiefs attendant upon the system which are not to every man thus familiar, and on which, for that reason, it is expedient to remark. In referring especially to some of those moral consequences of war which commonly obtain little of our attention, it may be observed, that social and political considerations are necessarily involved in the moral tendency ; for the happiness of society is always diminished by the diminution of morality ; and enlightened policy knows that the greatest support of a state is the virtue of the people.

And yet the reader should bear in mind—what nothing but the frequency of the calamity can make him forget—the intense sufferings and irreparable deprivations which one battle inevitably entails upon private life. These are calamities of which the world thinks little, and which, if it thought of them, it could not remove. A father or a husband can seldom be replaced ; a void is created in the domestic felicity which there is little hope that the future will fill. By the slaughter of a war, there are thousands who weep in unpitied and unnoticed secrecy, whom the world does not see ; and thousands who retire, in silence, to hopeless poverty, for whom it does not care. To these, the conquest of a kingdom is of little importance. The loss of a protector or a friend is ill repaid by empty glory. An addition of territory may add titles to a king, but the brilliancy of a crown throws little light upon domestic gloom. It is not my intention to insist upon these calamities, intense, and irreparable, and unnumbered as they are ; but those who begin a war without taking them into their estimates of its consequences, must be regarded as, at most, half-seeing politicians. The legitimate object of political measures is the good of the people ;—and a great sum of good a war must produce, if it out-balances even this portion of its mischiefs.

Nor should we be forgetful of that dreadful part of all warfare, the destruction of mankind. The frequency with which this destruction is represented to our minds, has almost extinguished our perception of its awfulness and horror. Between the years 1141 and 1815, an interval of six hundred and seventy years, our country has been at war, with France alone, two hundred and sixty-six years. If to this we add our wars with other countries, probably we shall find that one-half of the last six or seven centuries has been spent by this country in war ! A dreadful picture of human violence ! How many of our fellow-men, of our fellow-Christians, have these centuries of slaughter cut off! What is the sum total of the misery of their deaths?*

When political writers expatiate upon the extent and the evils of taxation, they do not sufficiently bear in mind the reflection, that almost all our taxation is the effect of war. A man declaims upon national debts. He ought to declaim upon the parent of those debts. Do we reflect that if heavy taxation entails evils and misery upon the community, that misery and those evils are inflicted upon us by war? The amount of supplies in Queen Anne's reign was about seventy millions; † and of this about sixty-six millions ‡ was expended in war. Where is our equivalent good?

Such considerations ought, undoubtedly, to influence the conduct of public men in their disagreements with other states even if higher considerations do not influence it. They ought to form part of the calculations of the evil of hostility. I believe that a greater mass of human suffering and loss of human enjoyment are occasioned by the pecuniary distresses of a war, than any ordinary advantages of a war compensate. But this consideration seems too remote to obtain our notice. Anger at offence or hope of triumph, overpowers the sober calculations of reason, and outbalances the weight of after and long-continued calamities. The only question appears to be, whether taxes enough for a war can be raised, and whether a people will be willing to pay them. But the great question ought to be, (setting questions of Christianity aside,) whether the nation will gain as much by the war as they will lose by taxation and its other calamities.

* "Since the peace of Amiens more than four millions of human beings have been sacrificed to the personal ambition of Napoleon Bonaparte."—Quarterly Review, 25 Art. 1, 1825.

† The sum was £69,815,457.

‡ The sum was £65,853,799. "The nine years' war of 1739, cost this nation upwards of sixty-four millions without gaining any object." Chalmer's Estimate of the Strength of Great Britain.

If the happiness of the people were, what it ought to be, the primary and the ultimate object of national measures, I think that the policy which pursued this object, would often find that even the pecuniary distresses resulting from a war make a greater deduction from the quantum of felicity, than those evils which the war may have been designed to avoid.

“But war does more harm to the morals of men than even to their property and persons.”* If, indeed, it depraves our morals, more than it injures our persons and deducts from our property, how enormous must its mischiefs be!

I do not know whether the greater sum of moral evil resulting from war, is suffered by those who are immediately engaged in it, or by the public. The mischief is most extensive upon the community, but upon the profession it is most intense.

“Rara fides pietasque viris qui castra sequuntur”—LUCAN.

No one pretends to applaud the morals of an army, and for its religion, few think of it at all. The fact is too notorious to be insisted upon, that thousands who had filled their stations in life with propriety, and been virtuous from principle, have lost, by a military life, both the practice and the regard of morality; and when they have become habituated to the vices of war, have laughed at their honest and plodding brethren, who are still spiritless enough for virtue or stupid enough for piety.

Does any man ask, What occasions depravity in military life? I answer in the words of Robert Hall,† “War reverses, with respect to its objects, all the rules of morality. It is nothing less than a temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue. It is a system out of which almost all the virtues are excluded, and in which nearly all the vices are incorporated." And it requires no sagacity to discover, that those who are engaged in a practice which reverses all the rules of morality—which repeals all the principles of virtue, and in which nearly all the vices are incorporated, cannot, without the intervention of a miracle, retain their minds and morals undepraved.

* Erasmus.

† Sermon, 1822.

Look for illustration to the familiarity with the plunder of property and the slaughter of mankind which war induces. He who plunders the citizen of another nation without remorse or reflection, and bears away the spoil with triumph, will inevitably lose something of his principles of probity.* He who is familiar with slaughter, who has himself often perpetrated it, and who exults in the perpetration, will not retain undepraved the principles of virtue. His moral feelings are blunted; his moral vision is obscured; his principles are shaken; an inroad is made upon their integrity, and it is an inroad that makes after inroads the more easy. Mankind do not generally resist the influence of habit. If we rob and shoot those who are "enemies" to-day, we are in some degree prepared to shoot and rob those who are not enemies to-morrow. Law may indeed still restrain us from violence; but the power and efficiency of principle is diminished: and this alienation of the mind from the practice, the love, and the perception of Christian purity, therefore, of necessity extends its influence to the other circumstances of life. The whole evil is imputable to war; and we say that this evil forms a powerful evidence against it, whether we direct that evidence to the abstract question of its lawfulness, or to the practical question of its expediency. That can scarcely be lawful which necessarily occasions such wide-spread immorality. That can scarcely be expedient, which is so pernicious to virtue, and therefore to the state.

* See Smollett's England, vol. 4, p. 376. "This terrible truth, which I cannot help repeating, must be acknowledged:—indifference and selfishness are the predominant feelings in an army." Miot's Mémoires de l'Expédition en Egypte, &c. Mem. in the MSS.

The economy of war requires of every soldier an implicit submission to his superior; and this submission is required of every gradation of rank to that above it. "I swear to obey the orders of the officers who are set over me: so help me, God." This system may be necessary to hostile operations, but I think it is unquestionably adverse to intellectual and moral excellence.

The very nature of unconditional obedience implies the relinquishment of the use of the reasoning powers. Little more is required of the soldier than that he be obedient and brave. His obedience is that of an animal, which is moved by a goad or a bit, without judgment of his own; and his bravery is that of a mastiff that fights whatever mastiff others put before him.* It is obvious that in such agency the intellect and the understanding have little part. Now I think that this is important. He who, with whatever motive, resigns the direction of his conduct implicitly to another, surely cannot retain that erectness and independence of mind, that manly consciousness of mental freedom, which is one of the highest privileges of our nature. A British captain declares that "the tendency of strict discipline, such as prevails on board ships of war, where almost every act of a man's life is regulated by the orders of his superiors, is to weaken the faculty of independent thought.”* Thus the rational being becomes reduced in the intellectual scale: an encroachment is made upon the integrity of its independence. God has given us, individually, capacities for the regulation of our individual conduct. To resign its direction, therefore, to the absolute disposal of another, appears to be an unmanly and unjustifiable relinquishment of the privileges which he has granted to us. And the effect is obviously bad; for although no character will apply universally to any large class of men, and although the intellectual character of the military profession does not result only from this unhappy subjection; yet it will not be disputed, that the honorable exercise of intellect amongst that profession is not relatively great. It is not from them that we expect, because it is not from them that we generally find, those vigorous exertions of intellect which dignify our nature and which extend the boundaries of human knowledge.

* By one article of the Constitutional Code even of republican France, "the army were expressly prohibited from deliberating on any subject whatever."

But the intellectual effects of military subjection form but a small portion of its evils. The great mischief is, that it requires the relinquishment of our moral agency; that it requires us to do what is opposed to our consciences, and what we know to be wrong. A soldier must obey, how criminal soever the command, and how criminal soever he knows it to be. It is certain, that of those who compose armies, many commit actions which they believe to be wicked, and which they would not commit but for the obligations of a military life. Although a soldier determinately believes that the war is unjust, although he is convinced that his particular part of the service is atrociously criminal, still he must proceed—he must prosecute the purposes of injustice or robbery, he must participate in the guilt, and be himself a robber.

* Captain Basil Hall: Voyage to Loo Choo, c. 2. We make no distinction between the military and naval professions, and employ one word to indicate both.

To what a situation is a rational and responsible being reduced, who commits actions, good or bad, at the word of another? I can conceive no greater degradation. It is the lowest, the final abjectness of the moral nature. It is this if we abate the glitter of war, and if we add this glitter it is nothing more.

Such a resignation of our moral agency is not contended for, or tolerated in any one other circumstance of human life. War stands upon this pinnacle of depravity alone. She, only, in the supremacy of crime, has told us that she has abolished even the obligation to be virtuous.

Some writers who have perceived the monstrousness of this system, have told us that a soldier should assure himself, before he engages in a war, that it is a lawful and just one; and they acknowledge that, if he does not feel this assurance, he is a "murderer." But how is he to know that the war is just? It is frequently difficult for the people distinctly to discover what the objects of a war are. And if the soldier knew that it was just in its commencement, how is he to know that it will continue just in its prosecution? Every war is, in some parts of its course, wicked and unjust; and who can tell what that course will be? You say—When he discovers any injustice or wickedness, let him withdraw: we answer, He cannot; and the truth is, that there is no way of avoiding the evil, but by avoiding the army.

It is an enquiry of much interest, under what circumstances of responsibility a man supposes himself to be placed, who thus abandons and violates his own sense of rectitude and of his duties. Either he is responsible for his actions, or he is not; and the question is a serious one to determine.* Christianity has certainly never stated any cases in which personal responsibility ceases. If she admits such cases, she has at least not told us so; but she has told us, explicitly and repeatedly, that she does require individual obedience and impose individual responsibility. She has made no exceptions to the imperativeness of her obligations, whether we are required by others to neglect them or not; and I can discover in her sanctions no reason to suppose, that in her final adjudications she admits the plea, that another required us to do that which she required us to forbear.—But it may be feared, it may be believed, that how little soever religion will abate of the responsibility of those who obey, she will impose not a little upon those who command. They, at least, are answerable for the enormities of war: unless, indeed, any one shall tell me that responsibility attaches nowhere; that that which would be wickedness in another man, is innocence in a soldier; and that heaven has granted to the directors of war a privileged immunity, by virtue of which crime incurs no guilt and receives no punishment.

And here it is fitting to observe, that the obedience to arbitrary power which war exacts, possesses more of the character of servility, and even of slavery, than we are accustomed to suppose. I will acknowledge that when I see a company of men in a stated dress, and of a stated color, ranged, rank and file, in the attitude of obedience, turning or walking at the word of another, now changing the position of a limb and now altering the angle of a foot, I feel that there is something in the system that is wrong—something incongruous with the proper dignity, with the intellectual station of man. I do not know whether I shall be charged with indulging in idle sentiment or idle affectation. If I hold unusual language upon the subject, let it be remembered that the subject is itself unusual. I will retract my affectation and sentiment, if the reader will show me any case in life parallel to that to which I have applied it.

* Vattel indeed tells us that soldiers ought to “submit their judgment.” “What,” says he, “would be the consequence, if at every step of the Sovereign the subjects were at liberty to weigh the justice of his reasons, and refuse to march to a war which, to them, might appear unjust?” Law of Nat. b. 3, c. II, sec. 187. Gisborne holds very different language. “It is,” he says, “at all times the duty of an Englishman steadfastly to decline obeying any orders of his superiors, which his conscience should tell him were in any degree impious or unjust.” Duties of Men.

No one questions whether military power be arbitrary. And what are the customary feelings of mankind with respect to a subjection to arbitrary power? How do we feel and think, when we hear of a person who is obliged to do whatever other men command, and who, the moment he refuses, is punished for attempting to be free? If a man orders his servant to do a given action, he is at liberty, if he thinks the action improper, or if, from any other cause, he choose not to do it, to refuse his obedience. Far other is the nature of military subjection. The soldier is compelled to obey, whatever be his inclination or his will. It matters not whether he have entered the service voluntarily or involuntarily. Being in it, he has but one alternative—submission to arbitrary power, or punishment—the punishment of death perhaps—for refusing to submit. Let the reader imagine to himself any other cause or purpose for which freemen shall be subjected to such a condition, and he will then see that condition in its proper light. The influence of habit and the gloss of public opinion make situations that would otherwise be loathsome and revolting, not only tolerable but pleasurable. Take away this influence and this gloss from the situation of a soldier, and what should we call it? We should call it a state of degradation and of bondage. But habit and public opinion, although they may influence notions, cannot alter things. It is a state intellectually, morally, and politically, of bondage and degradation.

But the reader will say that this submission to arbitrary power is necessary to the prosecution of war. I know it; and that is the very point for observation. It is because it is necessary to war that it is noticed here; for a brief but clear argument results:—That custom to which such a state of mankind is necessary, must inevitably be bad;—it must inevitably be adverse to rectitude and to Christianity. So deplorable is the bondage which war produces, that we often hear, during a war, of subsidies from one nation to another, for the loan, or rather for the purchase of an army.—To borrow ten thousand men who know nothing of our quarrel and care nothing for it, to help us to slaughter their fellows! To pay for their help in guineas to their sovereign! Well has it been exclaimed, “War is a game, that, were their subjects wise, Kings would not play at.”

A prince sells his subjects as a farmer sells his cattle; and sends them to destroy a people, whom, if they had been higher bidders, he would perhaps have sent them to defend. The historian has to record such miserable facts, as that a potentate's troops were, during one war, “hired to the king of Great Britain and his enemies alternately, as the scale of convenience happened to preponderate!”* That a large number of persons with the feelings and reason of men, should coolly listen to the bargain of their sale, should compute the guineas that will pay for their blood, and should then quietly be led to a place where they are to kill people towards whom they have no animosity, is simply wonderful. To what has inveteracy of habit reconciled mankind! I have no capacity of supposing a case of slavery, if slavery be denied in this. Men have been sold in another continent, and philanthropy has been shocked and aroused to interference; yet these men were sold not to be slaughtered but to work: but of the purchases and sales of the world's political slave-dealers, what does philanthropy think or care? There is no reason to doubt that, upon other subjects of horror, similar familiarity of habit would produce similar effects; or that he who heedlessly contemplates the purchase of an army, wants nothing but this familiarity to make him heedlessly look on at the commission of parricide.

* Smollet's England, v. 4, p. 330.

Yet I do not know whether, in its effects on the military character, the greatest moral evil of war is to be sought. Upon the community its effects are indeed less apparent, because they who are the secondary subjects of the immoral influence, are less intensely affected by it than the immediate agents of its diffusion. But whatever is deficient in the degree of evil, is probably more than compensated by its extent. The influence is like that of a continual and noxious vapor: we neither regard nor perceive it, but it secretly undermines the moral health.

Every one knows that vice is contagious. The depravity of one man has always a tendency to deprave his neighbors, and it therefore requires no unusual acuteness to discover, that the prodigious mass of immorality and crime which is accumulated by a war, must have a powerful effect in "demoralizing" the public. But there is one circumstance connected with the injurious influence of war, which makes it peculiarly operative and malignant. It is, that we do not hate or fear the influence, and do not fortify ourselves against it. Other vicious influences insinuate themselves into our minds by stealth; but this we receive with open embrace. Glory, and patriotism, and bravery, and conquest, are bright and glittering things. Who, when he is looking, delighted, upon these things, is armed against the mischiefs which they veil?

The evil is, in its own nature, of almost universal operation. During a war, a whole people become familiarized with the utmost excesses of enormity—with the utmost intensity of human wickedness—and they rejoice and exult in them; so that there is probably not an individual in a hundred who does not lose something of his Christian principles by a ten years' war.

“It is, in my mind,” said Fox, “no small misfortune to live at a period when scenes of horror and blood are frequent.”—“One of the most evil consequences of war is, that it tends to render the hearts of mankind callous to the feelings and sentiments of humanity.”*

Those who know what the moral law of God is, and who feel an interest in the virtue and the happiness of the world, will not regard the animosity of party and the restlessness of resentment which are produced by a war, as trifling evils. If any thing be opposite to Christianity, it is retaliation and revenge. In the obligation to restrain these dispositions much of the characteristic placability of Christianity consists. The very essence and spirit of our religion are abhorrent from resentment.—The very essence and spirit of war are promotive of resentment; and what, then, must be their mutual adverseness? That war excites these passions, needs not to be proved. When a war is in contemplation, or when it has been begun, what are the endeavors of its promoters? They animate us by every artifice of excitement to hatred and animosity. Pamphlets, placards, newspapers, caricatures—every agent is in requisition to irritate us into malignity. Nay, dreadful as it is, the pulpit resounds with declamations to stimulate our too sluggish resentment, and to invite us to slaughter.—And thus the most unchristianlike of all our passions, the passion which it is most the object of our religion to repress, is excited and fostered. Christianity cannot be flourishing under circumstances like these. The more effectually we are animated to war, the more nearly we extinguish the dispositions of our religion. War and Christianity are like the opposite ends of a balance, of which one is depressed by the elevation of the other.

* Fell's Life of C. J. Fox.

These are the consequences which make war dreadful to a state. Slaughter and devastation are sufficiently terrible, but their collateral evils are their greatest. It is the immoral feeling that war diffuses—it is the depravation of principle, which forms the mass of its mischief.

To attempt to pursue the consequences of war through all their ramifications of evil, were, however, both endless and vain. It is a moral gangrene, which diffuses its humors through the whole political and social system. To expose its mischief, is to exhibit all evil; for there is no evil which it does not occasion, and it has much that is peculiar to itself.

That, together with its multiplied evils, war produces some good, I have no wish to deny. I know that it sometimes elicits valuable qualities which had otherwise been concealed, and that it often produces collateral and adventitious, and sometimes immediate advantages. If all this could be denied, it would be needless to deny it; for it is of no consequence to the question whether it be proved. That any wide-extended system should not produce some benefits, can never happen. In such a system, it were an unheard-of-purity of evil, which was evil without any mixture of good.—But, to compare the ascertained advantages of war with its ascertained mischiefs and to maintain a question as to the preponderance of the balance, implies, not ignorance, but disingenuousness, not incapacity to decide, but a voluntary concealment of truth.

And why do we insist upon these consequences of war!—Because the review prepares the reader for a more accurate judgment respecting its lawfulness. Because it reminds him what war is, and because, knowing and remembering what it is, he will be the better able to compare it with the standard of rectitude.

LAWFULNESS OF WAR.

I WOULD recommend to him who would estimate the moral character of war, to endeavor to forget that he has ever presented to his mind the idea of a battle, and to endeavor to contemplate it with those emotions which it would excite in the mind of a being who had never before heard of human slaughter. The prevailing emotions of such a being would be astonishment and horror. If he were shocked by the horribleness of the scene, he would be amazed at its absurdity. That a large number of persons should assemble by agreement, and deliberately kill one another, appears to the understanding a proceeding so preposterous, so monstrous, that I think a being such as I have supposed would inevitably conclude that they were mad. Nor is it likely, if it were attempted to explain to him some motives to such conduct, that he would be able to comprehend how any possible circumstances could make it reasonable. The ferocity and prodigious folly of the act would, in his estimation, outbalance the weight of every conceivable motive, and he would turn unsatisfied away.

“Astonished at the madness of mankind.”

There is an advantage in making suppositions such as these ; because when the mind has been familiarized to a practice, however monstrous or inhuman, it loses some of its sagacity of moral perception ; the practice is perhaps veiled in glittering fictions, or the mind is become callous to its enormities. But if the subject is, by some circumstance, presented to the mind unconnected with any of its previous associations, we see it with a new judgment and new feelings ; and wonder, perhaps, that we have not felt so or thought so before. And such occasions it is the part of a wise man to seek ; since, if they never happen to us, it will often be difficult for us accurately to estimate the qualities of human actions, or to determine whether we approve them from a decision of our judgment, or whether we yield to them only the acquiescence of habit.

It may properly be a subject of wonder that the arguments which are brought to justify a custom such as war receive so little investigation. It must be a studious ingenuity of mischief which could devise a practice more calamitous or horrible ; and yet it is a practice of which it rarely occurs to us to enquire into the necessity, or to ask whether it cannot be, or ought not to be avoided. In one truth, however, all will acquiesce—that the arguments in favor of such a practice should be unanswerably strong.

Let it not be said that the experience and the practice of other ages have superseded the necessity of enquiry in our own ; that there can be no reason to question the lawfulness of that which has been sanctioned by forty centuries ; or that he who presumes to question it, is amusing himself with schemes of visionary philanthropy. "There is not, it may be," says Lord Clarendon, "a greater obstruction to the investigation of truth or the improvement of knowledge, than the too frequent appeal, and the too supine resignation of our understanding to antiquity."* Whosoever proposes an alteration of existing institutions, will meet, from some men, with a sort of instinctive opposition, which appears to be influenced by no process of reasoning, by no considerations of propriety or principles of rectitude which defends the existing system because it exists, and which would have equally defended its opposite if that had been the oldest. "Nor is it out of modesty that we have this resignation, or that we do, in truth, think those who have gone before us to be wiser than ourselves; we are as proud and as peevish as any of our progenitors; but it is out of laziness; we will rather take their words than take the pains to examine the reason they governed themselves by."† To those who urge objections from the authority of ages, it is, indeed, a sufficient answer to say, that they apply to every long-continued custom. Slave-dealers urged them against the friends of the abolition; Papists urged them against Wickliffe and Luther, and the Athenians probably thought it a good objection to an apostle, "that he seemed to be a setter forth of strange gods."

It is some satisfaction to be able to give on a question of this nature, the testimony of some great minds against the lawfulness of war, opposed, as these testimonies are, to the general prejudice and the general practice of the world. It has been observed by Beccaria, that "it is the fate of great truths to glow only like a flash of lightning amidst the dark clouds in which error has enveloped the universe;" and if our testimonies are few or transient, it matters not, so that their light be the light of truth. There are, indeed, many, who in describing the horrible particulars of a siege or a battle, indulge in some declamation on the horrors of war, such as has been often repeated, and often applauded, and as often forgotten. But such declamations are of little value and of little effect; he who reads the next paragraph finds, probably, that he is invited to follow the path to glory and to victory;—to share the hero's danger and partake the hero's praise; and he soon discovers that the moralizing parts of his author are the impulse of feelings rather than of principles, and thinks that though it may be very well to write, yet it is better to forget them.

* Lord Clarendon's Essays.

† Id.

There are, however, testimonies, delivered in the calm of reflection, by acute and enlightened men, which may reasonably be allowed at least so much weight as to free the present enquiry from the charge of being wild or visionary. Christianity indeed needs no such auxiliaries; but if they induce an examination of her duties, a wise man will not wish them to be disregarded.

“They who defend war,” says Erasmus, “must defend the dispositions which lead to war: and these dispositions are absolutely forbidden by the gospel.—Since the time that Jesus Christ said, Put up thy sword into its scabbard, Christians ought not to go to war.—Christ suffered Peter to fall into an error in this matter, on purpose that, when he had put up Peter's sword, it might remain no longer a doubt that war was prohibited, which, before that order had been considered as allowable.”—“Wickliffe seems to have thought it was wrong to take away the life of man on any account, and that war was utterly unlawful.”*—“I am persuaded,” says the Bishop of Landaff, “that when the spirit of Christianity shall exert its proper influence war

* Priestly.

will cease throughout the whole Christian world."* "War," says the same acute prelate, "has practices and principles peculiar to itself, which but ill quadrate with the rule of moral rectitude, and are quite abhorrent from the benignity of Christianity." † A living writer of eminence bears this remarkable testimony :—"There is but one community of Christians in the world, and that unhappily of all communities one of the smallest, enlightened enough to understand the prohibition of war by our Divine Master, in its plain, literal, and undeniable sense, and conscientious enough to obey it, subduing the very instinct of nature to obedience." ‡

Dr. Vicessimus Knox speaks in language equally specific :—" Morality and religion forbid war, in its motives, conduct and consequences." §

Those who have attended to the mode in which the moral law is instituted in the expressions of the will of God, will have no difficulty in supposing that it contains no specific prohibition of war. Accordingly, if we be asked for such a prohibition, in the manner in which Thou shalt not kill is directed to murder, we willingly answer that no such prohibition exists ;—and it is not necessary to the argument. Even those who would require such a prohibition, are themselves satisfied respecting the obligation of many negative duties on which there has been no specific decision in the New Testament. They believe that suicide is not lawful : yet Christianity never forbade it. It can be shown, indeed, by implication and inference, that suicide could not have been allowed, and with this they are satisfied. Yet there is, probably, in the Christian * Life of Bishop Watson.

† Id.

‡ Southey's History of Brazil.

§ Essays—The Paterines or Gazari of Italy in the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries "held that it was not lawful to bear arms or to kill mankind."

scriptures, not a twentieth part of as much indirect evidence against the lawfulness of suicide as there is against the lawfulness of war. To those who require such a command as Thou shalt not engage in war, it is therefore sufficient to reply, that they require that, which, upon this and upon many other subjects, Christianity has not seen fit to give.

We have had many occasions to illustrate, in the course of these disquisitions, the characteristic nature of the moral law as a law of benevolence. This benevolence, this good-will and kind affections towards one another, is placed at the basis of practical morality—it is “the fulfilling of the law”—it is the test of the validity of our pretensions to the Christian character. We have had occasion, too, to observe, that this law of benevolence is universally applicable to public affairs as well as to private, to the intercourse of nations as well as of men. Let us refer, then, to some of those requisitions of this law which appear peculiarly to respect the question of the moral character of war.

Have peace one with another.—By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.

Walk with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love.

Be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another; love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous: not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing.

Be at peace among yourselves. See that none render evil for evil unto any man.—God hath called us to peace.

Follow after love, patience, meekness.—Be gentle, showing all meekness unto all men.—Live in peace.

Lay aside all malice.—Put off anger, wrath, malice.—Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice.

Avenge not yourselves.—If thine enemy hunger, feed him : if he thirst, give him drink.—Recompense to no man evil for evil.—Overcome evil with good.

Now we ask of any man who looks over these passages, What evidence do they convey respecting the lawfulness of war? Could any approval or allowance of it have been subjoined to these instructions, without obvious and most gross inconsistency?—But if war is obviously and most grossly inconsistent with the general character of Christianity ; if war could not have been permitted by its teachers, without an egregious violation of their own precepts, we think that the evidence of its unlawfulness, arising from this general character alone, is as clear, as absolute, and as exclusive, as could have been contained in any form of prohibition whatever.

But it is not from general principles alone that the law of Christianity respecting war may be deduced.—Ye have heard that it hath been said, “ An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth : but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil : but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right check, turn to him the other also.—Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy : but I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you ; for if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye ?”*

Of the precepts from the Mount the most obvious characteristic is greater moral excellence and superior purity. They are directed, not so immediately to the external regulation of the conduct, as to the restraint and purification of the affections. In another precept it is not enough that an unlawful passion be just so far restrained as to produce no open immorality—the passion itself is forbidden. The tendency of the discourse is to attach guilt not to action only but also to thought. It has been said, "Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: but I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother, without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment."* Our Lawgiver attaches guilt to some of the violent feelings, such as resentment, hatred, revenge; and by doing this, we contend that he attaches guilt to war. War cannot be carried on without those passions which he prohibits. Our argument, therefore, is syllogistical:—War cannot be allowed, if that which is necessary to war is prohibited. This, indeed, is precisely the argument of Erasmus:—"They who defend war must defend the dispositions which lead to war; and these dispositions are absolutely forbidden."

* Mat. v. 38, &c.

Whatever might have been allowed under the Mosaic institution as to retaliation or resentment, Christianity says, "If ye love them only which love you, what reward have ye?—Love your enemies." Now what sort of love does that man bear towards his enemy, who runs him through with a bayonet? We repeat, that the distinguishing duties of Christianity must be sacrificed when war is carried on. The question is between the abandonment of these duties and the abandonment of war, for both cannot be retained.†

It is however objected, that the prohibitions,

* Mat. v. 21, 22.

† Yet the retention of both has been, unhappily enough, attempted. In a late publication, of which a part is devoted to the defence of war, the author gravely recommends soldiers, whilst shooting and stabbing their enemies, to maintain towards them a feeling of good-will!"—Tracts and Essays by the late William Hey, Esq., F. R. S. And Gisborne, in his Duties of Men, holds similar language. He advises the soldier "never to forget the common ties of human nature by which he is inseparably united to his enemy."

“Resist not evil,” &c., are figurative ; and that they do not mean that no injury is to be punished, and no outrage to be repelled. It has been asked with complacent exultation, What would these advocates of peace say to him who struck them on the right cheek? Would they turn to him the other? What would these patient moralists say to him who robbed them of a coat? Would they give a cloak also? What would these philanthropists say to him who asked them to lend a hundred pounds? Would they not turn away? This is argumentum ad hominem; one example amongst the many, of that low and dishonest mode of intellectual warfare, which consists in exciting the feelings instead of convincing the understanding. It is however, some satisfaction, that the motive to the adoption of this mode of warfare is itself an indication of a bad cause; for what honest reasoner would produce only a laugh, if he were able to produce conviction?

We willingly grant that not all the precepts from the Mount were designed to be literally obeyed in the intercourse of life. But what then! To show that their meaning is not literal, is not to show that they do not forbid war. We ask in our turn, What is the meaning of the precepts? What is the meaning of “Resist not evil?” Does it mean to allow bombardment—devastation—slaughter? If it does not mean to allow all this, it does not mean to allow war. What, again, do the objectors say is the meaning of, “Love your enemies,” or of, “Do good to them that hate you?” Does it mean, “ruin their commerce”—“sink their fleets”—“plunder their cities”—“shoot through their hearts?” If the precept does not mean to allow all this, it does not mean to allow war. It is, therefore, not at all necessary here to discuss the precise signification of some of the precepts from the Mount, or to define what limits Christianity may admit in their application, since whatever exceptions she may allow, it is manifest what she does not allow :* for if we give to our objectors whatever license of interpretation they may desire, they cannot, without virtually rejecting the precepts, so interpret them as to make them allow war.

Of the injunctions that are contrasted with, “eye for eye, and tooth for tooth,” the entire scope and purpose is the suppression of the violent passions, and the inculcation of forbearance and forgiveness, and benevolence and love. They forbid not specifically, the act, but the spirit of war ; and this method of prohibition Christ ordinarily employed. He did not often condemn the individual doctrines or customs of the age, however false or however vicious ; but he condemned the passions by which only vice could exist, and inculcated the truth which dismissed every error. And this method was undoubtedly wise. In the gradual alterations of human wickedness, many new species of profligacy might arise which the world had not yet practised : in the gradual vicissitudes of human error, many new fallacies might obtain which the world had not yet held : and how were these errors and these crimes to be opposed, but by the inculcation of principles that were applicable to every crime and to every error ? — principles which define not always what is wrong, but which tell us what always is right.

There are two modes of censure or condemnation ; the one is to reprobate evil, and the other to enforce

* It is manifest, from the New Testament, that we are not required to give a “cloak,” in every case, to him who robs us of “a coat ;” but I think it is equally manifest that we are required to give it not the less, because he has robbed us : the circumstance of his having robbed us, does not entail an obligation to give ; but it also does not impart a permission to withhold. If the necessities of the plunderer require relief, it is the business of the plundered to relieve them.

the opposite good ; and both those modes were adopted by Christ.—He not only censured the passions that are necessary to war, but inculcated the affections which are most opposed to them. The conduct and dispositions upon which he pronounced his solemn benediction are exceedingly remarkable. They are these, and in this order : Poverty of spirit ;—mourning ;—meekness ;—desire of righteousness ;—mercy ;—purity of heart ;—peacemaking ;—sufferance of persecution. Now let the reader try whether he can propose eight other qualities, to be retained as the general habit of the mind which shall be more incongruous with war.

Of these benedictions, I think the most emphatical is that pronounced upon the peacemakers. “Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.”* Higher praise or a higher title, no man can receive. Now, I do not say that these benedictions contain an absolute proof that Christ prohibited war, but I say they make it clear that he did not approve it. He selected a number of subjects for his solemn approbation ; and not one of them possesses any congruity with war, and some of them cannot possibly exist in conjunction with it. Can any one believe that he who made this selection, and who distinguished the peacemakers with peculiar approbation, could have sanctioned his followers in destroying one another? Or does any one believe that those who were mourners, and meek and merciful and peacemaking, could at the same time perpetrate such destruction? If I be told that a temporary suspension of Christian dispositions, although necessary to the prosecution of war, does not imply the extinction of Christian principles ; or that these dispositions may be the general habit of the mind, and may both precede and follow the acts of war, I answer that this is to grant all that I require, since it grants that, when we engage in war, we abandon Christianity.

* Matt. v. 9.

When the betrayers and murderers of Jesus Christ approached him, his followers asked, "Shall we smite with the sword?" and without waiting for an answer, one of them "drew his sword, and smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear."—"Put up again thy sword into his place," said his Divine Master; "for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."* There is the greater importance in the circumstances of this command, because it prohibited the destruction of human life in a cause in which there were the best of possible reasons for destroying it. The question, "shall we smite with the sword," obviously refers to the defence of the Redeemer from his assailants, by force of arms. His followers were ready to fight for him; and if any reason for fighting could be a good one, they certainly had it. But if, in defence of Himself from the hands of bloody ruffians, his religion did not allow the sword to be drawn, for what reason can it be lawful to draw it? The advocates of war are at least bound to show a better reason for destroying mankind, than is contained in this instance in which it was forbidden.

It will, perhaps, be said, that the reason why Christ did not suffer himself to be defended by arms, was, that such a defence would have defeated the purpose for which he came into the world, namely, to offer up his life; and that he himself assigns this reason in the context.—He does indeed assign it; but the primary reason, the immediate context is,—“for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.” The reference to the destined sacrifice of his life is an after reference. This destined sacrifice might, perhaps, have formed a reason why his followers should not fight then, but the first, the principal reason which he assigned, was the reason why they should not fight at all.—Nor is it necessary to define the precise import of the words, “for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword ;” since it is sufficient for us all, that they imply reprobation.

* Matt. xxvi. 52.

It is with the apostles as with Christ himself. The incessant object of their discourses and writings is the inculcation of peace, of mildness, of placability. It might be supposed that they continually retained in prospect the reward which would attach to “peacemakers.” We ask the advocate of war, whether he discovers in the writings of the apostles or of the evangelists, any thing that indicates they approved of war. Do the tenor and spirit of their writings bear any congruity with it? Are not their spirit and tenor entirely discordant with it? We are entitled to renew the observation, that the pacific nature of the apostolic writings, proves, presumptively, that the writers disallowed war. That could not be allowed by them as sanctioned by Christianity, which outraged all the principles that they inculcated.

“Whence come wars and fightings among you?” is the interrogation of one of the apostles, to some whom he was reproving for their unchristian conduct : and he answers himself by asking them, “Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?”* This accords precisely with the argument that we urge. Christ forbade the passions which lead to war ; and now, when these passions had broken out into actual fighting, his apostle, in condemning war, refers it back to their passions. We have been saying that the passions are condemned, and therefore war ; and now, again, the apostle James thinks, like his master, that the most effectual way of eradicating war, is to eradicate the passions which produce it.

* James iv. 1.

In the following quotation we are told, not only what the arms of the apostles were not, but what they were. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."* I quote this, not only because it assures us that the apostles had nothing to do with military weapons, but because it tells us the object of their warfare—the bringing every thought to the obedience of Christ; and this object I would beg the reader to notice, because it accords with the object of Christ himself in his precepts from the Mount—the reduction of the thoughts to obedience. The apostle doubtless knew that, if he could effect this, there was little reason to fear that his converts would slaughter one another. He followed the example of his master. He attacked wickedness in its root; and inculcated those general principles of purity and forbearance, which, in their prevalence, would abolish war, as they would abolish all other crimes. The teachers of Christianity addressed themselves not to communities but to men. They enforced the regulation of the passions and the rectification of the heart, and it was probably clear to the perceptions of apostles, although it is not clear to some species of philosophy, that whatever duties were binding upon one man, were binding upon ten, upon a hundred, and upon the state.

War is not often directly noticed in the writings of the apostles. When it is noticed, it is condemned, just in that way in which we should suppose any thing would be condemned that was notoriously opposed to the whole system—just as murder is condemned at the present day. Who can find, in modern books, that murder is formally censured? We may find censures of its motives, of its circumstances, of its degrees of atrocity ; but the act itself no one thinks of censuring, because every one knows that it is wicked. Setting statutes aside, I doubt whether, if an Otaheitan should choose to argue that Christians allow murder because he cannot find it formally prohibited in their writings, we should not be at a loss to find direct evidence against him. And it arises, perhaps, from the same causes, that a formal prohibition of war is not to be found in the writings of the apostles. I do not believe they imagined that Christianity would ever be charged with allowing it. They write, as if the idea of such a charge never occurred to them. They did, nevertheless, virtually forbid it ; unless any one shall say that they disallowed the passions which occasion war, but did not allow war itself : that Christianity prohibits the cause but permits the effect ; which is much the same as to say, that a law which forbade the administering arsenic did not forbid poisoning.

* 2 Cor. x. 4.

But although the general tenor of Christianity and some of its particular precepts appear distinctly to condemn and disallow war, it is certain that different conclusions have been formed ; and many, who are undoubtedly desirous of performing the duties of Christianity, have failed to perceive that war is unlawful to them.

In examining the arguments by which war is defended, two important considerations should be borne in mind—first, that those who urge them are not simply defending war, they are also defending themselves. If war be wrong, their conduct is wrong ; and the desire of self-justification prompts them to give importance to whatever arguments they can advance in its favor. Their decisions may, therefore, with reason, be regarded as in some degree the decisions of a party in the cause. The other consideration is, that the defenders of war come to the discussion prepossessed in its favor. They are attached to it by their earliest habits. They do not examine the question as a philosopher would examine it, to whom the subject was new. Their opinions had been already formed. They are discussing a question which they had already determined : and every man, who is acquainted with the effects of evidence on the mind, knows that under these circumstances a very slender argument in favor of the previous opinions, possesses more influence than many great ones against it. Now all this cannot be predicated of the advocates of peace, they are opposing the influence of habit ; they are contending against the general prejudice ; they are, perhaps, dismissing their own previous opinions : and I would submit it to the candor of the reader, that these circumstances ought to attach, in his mind, suspicion to the validity of the arguments against us.

The narrative of the centurion who came to Jesus at Capernaum to solicit him to heal his servant, furnishes one of these arguments. It is said that Christ found no fault with the centurion's profession ; that if he had disallowed the military character, he would have taken this opportunity of censuring it ; and that, instead of such censure he highly commended the officer, and said of him, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." *

An obvious weakness in this argument is this ; that it is founded not upon an approval, but upon silence. Approbation is indeed expressed, but it is directed, not to his arms, but to his "faith ;" and those who will read the narrative, will find that no occasion was given for noticing his profession. He came to Christ, not as a military officer, but simply as a deserving man. A censure of his profession might undoubtedly have been pronounced, but it would have been a gratuitous censure, a censure that did not naturally arise out of the case. The objection is, in its greatest weight, presumptive only; for none can be supposed to countenance every thing that he does not condemn. To observe silence* in such cases, was indeed the ordinary practice of Christ. He very seldom interfered with the civil or political institutions of the world. In these institutions there was sufficient wickedness around him; but some of them flagitious as they were, he never, on any occasion, even noticed. His mode of condemning and extirpating political vices, was, by the inculcation of general rules of purity, which, in their eventual and universal application, would reform them all.

* Matt. viii. 10.

But how happens it that Christ did not notice the centurion's religion? He surely was an idolater. And is there not as good reason for maintaining that Christ approved idolatry because he did not condemn it, as that he approved war because he did not condemn it? Reasoning from analogy, we should conclude that idolatry was likely to have been noticed rather than war; and it is therefore peculiarly and singularly unapt to bring forward the silence respecting war, as an evidence of its lawfulness.

A similar argument is advanced from the case of Cornelius, to whom Peter was sent from Joppa, of which it is said, that although the gospel was imparted to Cornelius by the especial direction of heaven, yet we do not find that he therefore quitted his profession, or * "Christianity, soliciting admission into all nations of the world, abstained, as behoved it, from intermeddling with the civil institutions of any. But does it follow, from the silence of Scripture concerning them, that all the civil institutions which then prevailed were right, or that the bad should not be exchanged for better?"—Paley.

that it was considered inconsistent with his new character. The objection applies to this argument as to the last—that it is built upon silence, that it is simply negative. We do not find that he quitted the service : I might answer, neither do we find that he continued in it. We only know nothing of the matter ; and the evidence is therefore so much less than proof, as silence is less than approbation. Yet that the account is silent respecting any disapprobation of war, might have been a reasonable ground of argument under different circumstances. It might have been a reasonable ground of argument, if the primary object of Christianity had been the reformation of political institutions, or, perhaps, even if her primary object had been the regulation of the external conduct ; but her primary object was neither of these. She directed herself to the reformation of the heart, knowing that all other reformation would follow. She embraced, indeed, both morality and policy, and has reformed, or will reform, both—not so much immediately as consequently—not so much by filtering the current, as by purifying the spring. The silence of Peter, therefore, in the case of Cornelius, will serve the cause of war but little : that little is diminished when urged against the positive evidence of commands and prohibitions, and it is reduced to nothingness when it is opposed to the universal tendency and object of the revelation.

It has sometimes been urged that Christ paid taxes to the Roman government at a time when it was engaged in war, and when, therefore, the money that he paid would be employed in its prosecution. This we shall readily grant ; but it appears to be forgotten by our opponents, that if this proves war to be lawful, they are proving too much. These taxes were thrown into the exchequer of the state, and a part of the money was applied to purposes of a most iniquitous and shocking nature—sometimes, probably, to the gratification of the emperor's personal vices, and to his gladiatorial exhibitions, &c., and certainly to the support of a miserable idolatry. If, therefore, the payment of taxes to such a government proves an approbation of war, it proves an approbation of many other enormities. Moreover, the argument goes too far in relation even to war ; for it must necessarily make Christ approve of all the Roman wars, without distinction of their justice or injustice—of the most ambitious, the most atrocious, and the most aggressive—and these, even our objectors will not defend. The payment of tribute by our Lord, was accordant with his usual system of avoiding to interfere in the civil or political institutions of the world.

“He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one.”* This is another passage that is brought against us. “For what purpose,” it is asked, “were they to buy swords, if swords might not be used?” It may be doubted whether with some of those who advance this objection, it is not an objection of words rather than of opinion. It may be doubted whether they themselves think there is any weight in it. To those, however, who may be influenced by it, I would observe that, as it appears to me, a sufficient answer to the objection may be found in the immediate context: "Lord, behold here are two swords," said they, and he immediately answered, "It is enough." How could two be enough when eleven were to be supplied with them? That swords in the sense, and for the purpose, of military weapons, were even intended in this passage, there appears much reason for doubting. This reason will be discovered by examining and connecting such expressions as these: "The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," said our Lord. Yet, on another occasion, he says, "I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword." How are we to explain the meaning of the latter declaration? Obviously, by understanding "sword" to mean something far other than steel. There appears little reason for supposing that physical weapons were intended in the instruction of Christ. I believe they were not intended, partly because no one can imagine his apostles were in the habit of using such arms, partly because they declared that the weapons of their warfare were not carnal, and partly because the word "sword" is often used to imply "dissension," or the religious warfare of the Christian. Such an use of language is found in the last quotation; and it is found also in such expressions as these: "shield of faith,"—" helmet of salvation,"—" sword of the spirit,"—" I have fought the good fight of faith."

* Luke xxii. 36. Upon the interpretation of this passage of Scripture, I would subjoin the sentiments of two or three authors. Bishop Pearce says, “It is plain that Jesus never intended to make any resistance, or suffer a sword to be used on this occasion.” And Campbell says, “We are sure that he did not intend to be understood literally, but as speaking of the weapons of their spiritual warfare.” And Beza : “This whole speech is allegorical. My fellow soldiers, you have hitherto lived in peace, but now a dreadful war is at hand ; so that omitting all other things, you must think only of arms. But when he prayed in the garden, and reprov'd Peter for smiting with the sword, he himself showed what these arms were.”—See Peace and War, an essay. Hatchard, 1824.

But it will be said that the apostles did provide themselves with swords, for that on the same evening they asked, "Shall we smite with the sword?" This is true, and it may probably be true also, that some of them provided themselves with swords in consequence of the injunction of their Master. But what then? It appears to me that the apostles acted on this occasion upon the principles on which they had wished to act on another, when they asked, "Wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them?" And that their Master's principles of action were also the same in both—"Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." This is the language of Christianity; and I would seriously invite him who now justifies "destroying men's lives," to consider what manner of spirit he is of.

I think then, that no argument arising from the instruction to buy swords can be maintained. This, at least, we know, that when the apostles were completely commissioned, they neither used nor possessed them. An extraordinary imagination he must have, who conceives of an apostle, preaching peace and reconciliation, crying "forgive injuries,"—"love your enemies,"—"render not evil for evil;" and at the conclusion of the discourse, if he chanced to meet violence or insult, promptly drawing his sword and maiming or murdering the offender. We insist upon this consideration. If swords were to be worn, swords were to be used; and there is no rational way in which they could have been used, but some such as that which we have been supposing. If, therefore, the words, "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one," do not mean to authorize such an use of the sword, they do not mean to authorize its use at all: and those who adduce the passage, must allow its application in such a sense, or they must exclude it from any application to their purpose.

It has been said again, that when soldiers came to John the Baptist to enquire of him what they should do, he did not direct them to leave the service, but to be content with their wages. This, also, is at best but a negative evidence. It does not prove that the military profession was wrong, and it certainly does not prove that it was right. But in truth, if it asserted the latter, Christians have, as I conceive, nothing to do with it: for I think that we need not enquire what John allowed, or what he forbade. He, confessedly, belonged to that system which required "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth;" and the observations which we shall by and by make on the authority of the law of Moses, apply, therefore, to that of John the Baptist. Although it could be proved (which it cannot be) that he allowed wars, he acted not inconsistently with his own dispensation; and with that dispensation we have no business. Yet, if any one still insists upon the authority of John, I would refer him for an answer to Jesus Christ himself. What authority He attached to John on questions relating to His own dispensation, may be learnt from this—"The least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he."

It is perhaps no trifling indication of the difficulty which writers have found in discovering in the Christian Scriptures arguments in support of war, that they have had recourse to such equivocal and far-fetched arguments. Grotius adduces a passage which he says is "a leading point of evidence, to show that the right of war is not taken away by the law of the gospel." And what is this leading evidence? That Paul, in writing to Timothy, exhorts that prayer should be made "for kings!"*—Another evidence which this great man adduces is, that Paul suffered himself to be protected on his journey by a guard of soldiers, without hinting any disapprobation of repelling force by force. But how does Grotius know that Paul did not hint this? And who can imagine that to suffer himself to be guarded by a military escort, in the appointment of which he had no control, was to approve war?

But perhaps the real absence of sound Christian

* See Rights of War and Peace.

arguments in favor of war, is in no circumstance so remarkably intimated as in the citations of Milton in his Christian Doctrine. "With regard to the duties of war," he quotes or refers to thirty-nine passages of Scripture—thirty-eight of which are from the Hebrew Scriptures: and what is the individual one from the Christian?—"What king going to make war against another king!" &c.*

Such are the arguments which are adduced from the Christian Scriptures by the advocates of war. In these five passages, the principal of the New Testament evidences in its favor, unquestionably consist: they are the passages which men of acute minds, studiously seeking for evidence, have selected. And what are they? Their evidence is in the majority of instances negative at best. A "NOT" intervenes. The centurion was not found fault with: Cornelius was not told to leave the profession: John did not tell the soldiers to abandon the army; Paul did not refuse a military guard. I cannot forbear to solicit the reader to compare these objections with the pacific evidence of the gospel which has been laid before him; I would rather say, to compare it with the gospel itself; for the sum, the tendency, of the whole revelation is in our favor.

In an enquiry whether Christianity allows of war, there is a subject that always appears to me to be of peculiar importance—the prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the arrival of a period of universal peace. The belief is perhaps general amongst Christians, that a time will come when vice shall be eradicated from the world, when the violent passions of mankind shall be repressed, and when the pure benignity of Christianity shall be universally diffused. That such a period will come we indeed know assuredly, for God has promised it.

* Luke xiv. 31.

Of the many prophecies of the Old Testament respecting this period, we refer only to a few from the writings of Isaiah. In his predictions respecting the "last times," by which it is not disputed that he referred to the prevalence of the Christian religion, the prophet says—"They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."* Again, referring to the same period, he says—"They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."† And again, respecting the same era—"Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders."‡

Two things are to be observed in relation to these prophecies; 1st, that it is the will of God that war should eventually be abolished. This consideration is of importance; for if war be not accordant with His will, war cannot be accordant with Christianity, which is the revelation of His will. Our business, however, is principally with the second consideration—that Christianity will be the means of introducing this period of peace. From those who say that our religion sanctions war, an answer must be expected to questions such as these:—By what instrumentality and by the diffusion of what principles, will the prophecies of Isaiah be fulfilled? Are we to expect some new system of religion, by which the imperfections of Christianity shall be removed and its deficiencies supplied? Are we to believe that God sent his only Son into the world to institute a religion such as this, a religion that, in a few centuries, would require to be altered and amended? If Christianity allows of war, they must tell us what it is that is to extirpate war. If she allows "violence, and wasting, and destruction," they must tell us what are the principles that are to produce gentleness, and benevolence, and forbearance.—I know not what answer such enquiries will receive from the advocate of war, but I know that Isaiah says the change will be effected by Christianity: and if any one still chooses to expect another and a purer system, an apostle may perhaps, repress his hopes;—"Though we or an angel from heaven," says Paul, "preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."*

* Isa. ii. 4.

† Id. xi. 9.

‡ Id. lx. 18.

Whatever the principles of Christianity will require hereafter, they require now. Christianity, with its present principles and obligations, is to produce universal peace. It becomes, therefore, an absurdity, a simple contradiction, to maintain that the principles of Christianity allow of war, when they, and they only are to eradicate it. If we have no other guarantee of peace than the existence of our religion, and no other hope of peace than in its diffusion, how can that religion sanction war?

The case is clear. A more perfect obedience to that same gospel, which, we are told, sanctions slaughter, will be the means, and the only means, of exterminating slaughter from the world. It is not from an alteration of Christianity, but from an assimilation of Christians to its nature that we are to hope. It is because we violate the principles of our religion, because we are not what they require us to be, that wars are continued. If we will not be peaceable, let us then, at least, be honest, and acknowledge that we continue to slaughter one another, not because Christianity permits it, but because we reject her laws.

The opinions of the earliest professors of Christianity upon the lawfulness of war are of importance, because they who lived nearest to the time of its Founder were the most likely to be informed of his intentions and his will, and to practise them without those adulterations which we know have been introduced by the lapse of ages.

* Gal. I, 8.

During a considerable period after the death of Christ, it is certain, then, that his followers believed he had forbidden war, and that, in consequence of this belief, many of them refused to engage in it whatever were the consequence, whether reproach, or imprisonment, or death. These facts are indisputable. "It is as easy," says a learned writer of the seventeenth century, "to obscure the sun at mid-day, as to deny that the primitive Christians renounced all revenge and war." Christ and his apostles delivered general precepts for the regulation of our conduct. It was necessary for their successors to apply them to their practice in life. And to what did they apply the pacific precepts which had been delivered? They applied them to war; they were assured that the precepts absolutely forbade it. This belief they derived from those very precepts on which we have insisted; they referred expressly, to the same passages in the New Testament, and from the authority and obligation of those passages, they refuse to bear arms. A few examples from their history will show with what undoubting confidence they believed in the unlawfulness of war, and how much they were willing to suffer in the cause of peace.

Maximilian, as it is related in the Acts of Ruinart, was brought before the tribunal to be enrolled as a soldier. On the proconsul's asking his name, Maximilian replied, "I am a Christian and cannot fight." It was, however, ordered that he should be enrolled, but he refused to serve, still alleging that he was a Christian. He was immediately told that there was no alternative between bearing arms and being put to death. But his fidelity was not to be shaken :—“ I cannot fight,” said he, “ if I die.” He continued steadfast to his principles, and was consigned to the executioner.

The primitive Christians not only refused to be enlisted in the army, but when they embraced Christianity, whilst already enlisted, they abandoned the profession at whatever cost. Marcellus was a centurion in the legion called Trajana. Whilst holding this commission, he became a Christian ; and believing in common with his fellow-Christians, that war was no longer permitted to him, he threw down his belt at the head of the legion, delaring that he had become a Christian, and that he would serve no longer. He was committed to prison ; but he was still faithful to Christianity. “ It is not lawful,” said he, “ for a Christian to bear arms for any earthly consideration ;” and he was, in consequence, put to death. Almost immediately afterwards, Cassian, who was notary to the same legion, gave up his office. He steadfastly maintained the sentiments of Marcellus ; and, like him was consigned to the executioner. Martin, of whom so much is said by Sulpicius Severus, was bred to the profession of arms, which, on his acceptance of Christianity, he abandoned. To Julian the Apostate, the only reason that we find he gave for his conduct was this :—“ I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight.”

These were not the sentiments, and this was not the conduct, of insulated individuals who might be actuated by individual opinion, or by their private interpretations of the duties of Christianity. Their principles were the principles of the body. They were recognized and defended by the Christian writers, their contemporaries. Justin Martyr and Tatian talk of soldiers and Christians as distinct characters ; and Tatian says that the Christians declined even military commands. Clemens of Alexandria calls his Christian contemporaries the "followers of peace," and expressly tells us "that the followers of peace used none of the implements of war." Lactantius, another early Christian, says expressly, "It can never be lawful for a righteous man to go to war." About the end of the second century, Celsus, one of the opponents of Christianity, charged the Christians with refusing to bear arms even in case of necessity. Origen, the defender of the Christians, does not think of denying the fact; he admits the refusal, and justifies it, because war was unlawful. Even after Christianity had spread over almost the whole of the known world, Tertullian, in speaking of a part of the Roman armies, including more than one-third of the standing legions of Rome, distinctly informs us that "not a Christian could be found amongst them."

All this is explicit. The evidence of the following facts is, however, yet more determinate and satisfactory. Some of the arguments which, at the present day, are brought against the advocates of peace, were then urged against these early Christians: and these arguments they examined and repelled. This indicates investigation and enquiry, and manifests that their belief of the unlawfulness of war was not a vague opinion, hastily admitted and loosely floating amongst them, but that it was the result of deliberate examination, and a consequent firm conviction that Christ had forbidden it. The very same arguments which are brought in defence of war at the present day, were brought against the Christians sixteen hundred years ago; and sixteen hundred years ago, they were repelled by these faithful contenders for the purity of our religion. It is remarkable too, that Tertullian appeals to the precepts from the Mount, in proof of those principles on which this chapter has been insisting:—that the dispositions which the precepts inculcate are not compatible with war, and that war, therefore, is irreconcilable with Christianity.

If it be possible, a still stronger evidence of the primitive belief, is contained in the circumstance, that some of the Christian authors declared that the refusal of the Christians to bear arms, was a fulfilment of ancient prophecy. The peculiar strength of this evidence consists in this—that the fact of a refusal to bear arms is assumed as notorious and unquestioned. Irenæus, who lived about the year 180, affirms that the prophecy of Isaiah, which declared that men should turn their swords into plough-shares and their spears into pruning hooks, had been fulfilled in his time; “for the Christians,” says he, “have changed their swords and their lances into instruments of peace, and they know not how to fight.”—Justin Martyr, his contemporary, writes—“That the prophecy is fulfilled you have good reason to believe, for we, who in times past killed one another, do not now fight with our enemies.” Tertullian, who lived later, says, “You must confess that the prophecy has been accomplished, as far as the practice of every individual is concerned, to whom it is applicable.”

It has been sometimes said, that the motive which influenced the early Christians to refuse to engage in war, consisted in the idolatry which was connected with the Roman armies.—One motive this idolatry unquestionably afforded; but it is obvious, from the quotations which we have given, that their belief of the unlawfulness of fighting, independent of any question of idolatry, was an insuperable objection to engaging in war. Their words are explicit: “I cannot fight, if I die.”—“I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight.”—“Christ,” says Tertullian, “by disarming Peter, disarmed every soldier;” and Peter was not about to fight in the armies of idolatry. So entire was their conviction of the incompatibility of war with our religion, that they would not even be present at the gladiatorial fights, "lest," says Theophilus, "we should become partakers of the murders committed there." Can any one believe that they, who would not even witness a battle between two men, would themselves fight in a battle between armies? And the destruction of a gladiator, it should be remembered, was authorized by the state, as much as the destruction of enemies in war.

It is therefore indisputable, that the Christians who lived nearest to the time of our Saviour, believed, with undoubting confidence, that he had unequivocally forbidden war;—that they openly avowed this belief; and that, in support of it they were willing to sacrifice, and did sacrifice, their fortunes and their lives.

Christians, however, afterwards became soldiers: and when?—When their general fidelity to Christianity became relaxed;—when, in other respects, they violated its principles;—when they had begun "to dissemble" and "to falsify their word," and "to cheat;"—when "Christian casuists" had persuaded them that they might "sit at meat in the idol's temple;"—when Christians accepted even the priesthoods of idolatry. In a word, they became soldiers when they had ceased to be Christians.

The departure from the original faithfulness, was, however, not suddenly general. Like every other corruption, war obtained by degrees. During the first two hundred years, not a Christian soldier is upon record. In the third century, when Christianity became partially corrupted, Christian soldiers were common. The number increased with the increase of the general profligacy; until at last, in the fourth century, Christians became soldiers without hesitation, and perhaps without remorse. Here and there, however, an ancient father still lifted up his voice for peace ; but these, one after another, dropping from the world, the tenet that war is unlawful, ceased at length to be a tenet of the church.

Let it always be borne in mind, by those who are advocating war, that they are contending for a corruption which their forefathers abhorred ; and that they are making Jesus Christ the sanctioner of crimes, which his purest followers offered up their lives because they would not commit.

An argument has sometimes been advanced in favor of war, from the Divine communications to the Jews under the administration of Moses. It has been said, that as wars were allowed and enjoined to that people, they cannot be inconsistent with the will of God.

The reader, who has perused the first essay of this work, will be aware that to the present argument our answer is short :—If Christianity prohibits war, there is, to Christians, an end of the controversy. War cannot then be justified by the referring to any antecedent dispensation. One brief observation may, however, be offered, that those who refer, in justification of our present practice, to the authority by which the Jews prosecuted their wars, must be expected to produce the same authority for our own. Wars were commanded to the Jews, but are they commanded to us? War, in the abstract, was never commanded : and surely those specific wars which were enjoined upon the Jews for an express purpose, are neither authority nor example for us, who have received no such injunction, and can plead no such purpose.

It will, perhaps, be said, that the commands to prosecute wars, even to extermination, are so positive, and so often repeated, that it is not probable, if they were inconsistent with the will of heaven, that they would have been thus peremptorily enjoined. We answer, that they were not inconsistent with the will of heaven then. But even then, the prophets foresaw that they were not accordant with the universal will of God, since they predicted, that when that will should be fulfilled, war should be eradicated from the world. And by what dispensation was this will to be fulfilled? By that of the "Rod out of the stem of Jesse." It is worthy of recollection, too, that David was forbidden to build the temple because he had shed blood. "As for me it was in my mind to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God: but the word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight."* So little accordancy did war possess with the purer offices even of the Jewish dispensation.

Perhaps the argument to which the greatest importance is attached by the advocates of war, and by which thinking men are chiefly induced to acquiesce in its lawfulness is this—That a distinction is to be made between rules which apply to us as individuals, and rules which apply to us as subjects of the state; and that the pacific injunctions of Christ from the Mount, and all the other kindred commands and prohibitions of the Christian Scriptures, have no reference to our conduct as members of the political body.

If there be soundness in the doctrines which have been delivered at the commencement of the essay upon the "elements of political rectitude," this argument possesses no force or application.

When persons make such broad distinctions between the obligations of Christianity on private and on public affairs. the proof of the rectitude of the distinction must be expected of those who make it. General rules are laid down by Christianity, of which, in some cases, the advocate of war denies the applicability. He, therefore, is to produce the reason and the authority for the exception. And that authority must be a competent authority—the authority mediately or immediately of God. It is to no purpose for such a person to tell us of the magnitude of political affairs—of the greatness of the interests which they involve—of “necessity,” or of expediency. All these are very proper considerations in subordination to the moral law :—otherwise they are wholly nugatory and irrelevant. Let the reader observe the manner in which the argument is supported.—If an individual suffers aggression there is a power to which he can apply that is above himself and above the aggressor ; a power by which the bad passions of those around him are restrained, or by which their aggressions are punished. But amongst nations there is no acknowledged superior or common arbitrator. Even if there were, there is no way in which its decisions could be enforced, but by the sword. War, therefore, is the only means which one nation possesses of protecting itself from the aggression of another. The reader will observe the fundamental fallacy upon which the argument proceeds.—It assumes, that the reason why an individual is not permitted to use violence is, that the laws will use it for him. Here is the error ; for the foundation of the duty of forbearance in private life, is not that the laws will punish aggression, but that Christianity requires forbearance.

* 1 Chron. xxii. 7, 8.

Undoubtedly, if the existence of a common arbitrator were the foundation of the duty, the duty would not be binding upon nations. But that which we require to be proved is this—that Christianity exonerates nations from those duties which she has imposed upon individuals. This, the present argument does not prove : and, in truth, with a singular unhappiness in its application, it assumes, in effect, that she has imposed these duties upon neither the one nor the other.

If it be said, that Christianity allows to individuals some degree and kind of resistance, and that some resistance is therefore lawful to states, we do not deny it. But if it be said, that the degree of lawful resistance extends to the slaughter of our fellow Christians—that it extends to war—we do deny it : we say that the rules of Christianity cannot, by any possible latitude of interpretation, be made to extend to it. The duty of forbearance, then, is antecedent to all considerations respecting the condition of man ; and whether he be under the protection of laws or not, the duty of forbearance is imposed.

The only truth which appears to be elicited by the present argument is, that the difficulty of obeying the forbearing rules of Christianity is greater in the case of nations than in the case of individuals : The obligation to obey them is the same in both. Nor let any one urge the difficulty of obedience in opposition to the duty ; for he who does this, has yet to learn one of the most awful rules of his religion—a rule that was enforced by the precepts, and more especially by the final example, of Christ, of apostles and of martyrs—the rule which requires that we should be “obedient even unto death.”

Let it not, however, be supposed that we believe the difficulty of forbearance would be great in practice as it is great in theory. Our interests are commonly promoted by the fulfilment of our duties ; and we hope hereafter to show, that the fulfilment of the duty of forbearance forms no exception to the applicability of the rule.

The intelligent reader will have perceived that the “war” of which we speak is all war, without reference to its objects, whether offensive or defensive. In truth, respecting any other than defensive war, it is scarcely worth while to entertain a question, since no one with whom we are concerned to reason will advocate its opposite. Some persons indeed talk with much complacency of their reprobation of offensive war. Yet to reprobate no more than this, is only to condemn that which wickedness itself is not wont to justify. Even those who practise offensive war, affect to veil its nature by calling it by another name.

In conformity with this, we find that it is to defence that the peaceable precepts of Christianity are directed. Offence appears not to have even suggested itself. It is, "Resist not evil:" it is, "Overcome evil with good:" it is, "Do good to them that hate you:" it is, "Love your enemies:" it is, "Render not evil for evil:" it is, "Unto him that *smite*th thee on the one cheek." All this supposes previous offence, or injury, or violence; and it is then that forbearance is enjoined.

It is common with those who justify defensive war, to identify the question with that of individual self-defence; and although the questions are in practice sufficiently dissimilar, it has been seen that we object not to their being regarded as identical. The rights of self-defence have already been discussed, and the conclusions to which the moral law appears to lead, afford no support to the advocate of war.

We say the questions are practically dissimilar; so that if we had a right to kill a man in self-defence, very few wars would be shown to be lawful. Of the wars which are prosecuted, some are simply wars of aggression; some are for the maintenance of a balance of power; some are in assertion of technical rights; and some, undoubtedly, to repel invasion. The last are perhaps the fewest; and of these only it can be said that they bear any analogy whatever to the case which is supposed; and even in these, the analogy is seldom complete. It has rarely indeed happened that wars have been undertaken simply for the preservation of life, and that no other alternative has remained to a people than to kill, or to be killed. And let it be remembered, that unless this alternative alone remains, the case of individual self-defence is irrelevant : it applies not, practically, to the subject.

But indeed you cannot in practice make distinctions, even moderately accurate, between defensive war and war for other purposes.

Supposing, the Christian Scriptures had said, An army may fight in its own defence, but not for any other purpose.—Whoever will attempt to apply this rule in practice, will find that he has a very wide range of justifiable warfare : a range that will embrace many more wars, than moralists, laxer than we shall suppose them to be, are willing to defend. If an army may fight in defence of their own lives, they may, and they must fight in defence of the lives of others : if they may fight in the defence of the lives of others, they will fight in defence of their property : if in defence of property, they will fight in defence of political rights : if in defence of rights, they will fight in promotion of interests : if in promotion of interests, they will fight in promotion of their glory and their crimes. Now let any man of honesty look over the gradations by which we arrive at this climax, and I believe he will find that, in practice, no curb can be placed upon the conduct of an army until they reach that climax. There is, indeed, a wide distance between fighting in defence of life, and fighting in furtherance of our crimes ; but the steps which lead from one to the other will follow in inevitable succession. I know that the letter of our rule excludes it, but I know that the rule will be a letter only. It is very easy for us to sit in our studies, and to point the commas, and semicolons, and periods of the soldier's career : it is very easy for us to say, he shall stop at defence of life, or at protection of property, or at the support of rights ; but armies will never listen to us : we shall be only the Xerxes of morality, throwing out idle chains into the tempestuous ocean of slaughter.

What is the testimony of experience? When nations are mutually exasperated, and armies are levied, and battles are fought, does not every one know that with whatever motives of defence one party may have begun the contest, both, in turn, become aggressors? In the fury of slaughter, soldiers do not attend, they cannot attend, to questions of aggression. Their business is destruction, and their business they will perform. If the army of defence obtains success, it soon becomes an army of aggression. Having repelled the invader, it begins to punish him. If a war has once begun, it is vain to think of distinctions of aggression and defence. Moralists may talk of distinctions, but soldiers will make none ; and none can be made ; it is without the limits of possibility.

Indeed, some of the definitions of defensive or of just war which are proposed by moralists, indicate how impossible it is to confine warfare within any assignable limits. "The objects of just war," says Paley, "are precaution, defence, or reparation."—"Every just war supposes an injury perpetrated, attempted, or feared."

I shall acknowledge, that if these be justifying motives to war, I see very little purpose in talking of morality upon the subject.

It is in vain to expatiate on moral obligations, if we are at liberty to declare war whenever an "injury is feared :"—an injury, without limit to its insignificance ! a fear, without stipulation for its reasonableness ! The judges, also, of the reasonableness of fear, are to be they who are under its influence ; and who so likely to judge amiss as those who are afraid? Sounder philosophy than this has told us, that "he who has to reason upon his duty when the temptation to transgress it is before him, is almost sure to reason himself into an error."

Violence, and rapine, and ambition, are not to be restrained by morality like this. It may serve for the speculations of a study; but we will venture to affirm that mankind will never be controlled by it. Moral rules are useless, if, from their own nature they cannot be, or will not be applied. Who believes that if kings and conquerors may fight when they have fears, they will not fight when they have them not? The morality allows too much latitude to the passions, to retain any practical restraint upon them. And a morality that will not be practised, I had almost said, that cannot be practised, is an useless morality. It is a theory of morals. We want clearer and more exclusive rules; we want more obvious and immediate sanctions. It were in vain for a philosopher to say to a general who was burning for glory, "You are at liberty to engage in the war provided you have suffered, or fear you will suffer an injury—otherwise Christianity prohibits it." He will tell him of twenty injuries that have been suffered, of a hundred that have been attempted, and of a thousand that he fears. And what answer can the philosopher make to him?

If these are the proper standards of just war, there will be little difficulty in proving any war to be just, except, indeed, that of simple aggression; and by the rules of this morality, the aggressor is difficult of discovery, for he whom we choose to "fear," may say that he had previous "fear" of us, and that his "fear," prompted the hostile symptoms which made us "fear" again. The truth is, that to attempt to make any distinctions upon the subject is vain. War must be wholly forbidden, or allowed without restriction to defence ; for no definitions of lawful and unlawful war, will be, or can be, attended to. If the principles of Christianity, in any case, or for any purpose, allow armies to meet and to slaughter one another, her principles will never conduct us to the period which prophecy has assured us they shall produce. There is no hope of an eradication of war, but by an absolute and total abandonment of it.

OF THE PROBABLE PRACTICAL EFFECTS OF ADHERING TO THE MORAL LAW IN RESPECT TO WAR.

We have seen that the duties of the religion which God has imparted to mankind require irrisistance ; and surely it is reasonable to hope, even without a reference to experience, that he will make our irrisistance subservient to our interests : that if, for the purpose of conforming to his will, we subject ourselves to difficulty or danger, he will protect us in our obedience, and direct it to our benefit : that if he requires us not to be concerned in war, he will preserve us in peace : that he will not desert those who have no other protection, and who have abandoned all other protection because they confide in His alone.

This we may reverently hope ; yet it is never to be forgotten that our apparent interests in the present life are sometimes, in the economy of God, made subordinate to our interests in futurity.

Yet, even in reference only to the present state of existence, I believe that we shall find that the testimony of experience is, that forbearance is most conducive to our interests. There is practical truth in the position, that “ When a man’s ways please the Lord,” he “ maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.”

The reader of American history will recollect, that in the beginning of the last century a desultory and most dreadful warfare was carried on by the natives against the European settlers ; a warfare that was provoked—as such warfare has almost always originally been—by the injuries and violence of the Christians. The mode of destruction was secret and sudden. The barbarians sometimes lay in wait for those who might come within their reach, on the highway or in the field, and shot them without warning : and sometimes they attacked the Europeans in their houses, “scalping some, and knocking out the brains of others.” From this horrible warfare the inhabitants sought safety by abandoning their homes, and retiring to fortified places, or to the neighborhood of garrisons ; and those whom necessity still compelled to pass beyond the limits of such protection, provided themselves with arms for their defence. But amidst this dreadful desolation and universal terror, the Society of Friends, who were a considerable portion of the whole population, were steadfast to their principles. They would neither retire to garrisons nor provide themselves with arms. They remained openly in the country, whilst the rest were flying to the forts. They still pursued their occupations in the fields or at their homes, without a weapon either for annoyance or defence. And what was their fate? They lived in security and quiet. The habitation which, to his armed neighbor, was the scene of murder and of the scalping-knife, was to the unarmed Quaker a place of safety and of peace.

Three of the Society were however killed. And who were they? They were three who abandoned their principles. Two of these victims were men who, in the simple language of the narrator, “used to go to their labor without any weapons, and trusted to the Almighty, and depended on his providence to protect them (it being their principle not to use weapons of war to offend others, or to defend themselves ;) but a spirit of distrust taking place in their minds, they took weapons of war to defend themselves, and the Indians who had seen them several times without them and let them alone, saying they were peaceable men and hurt nobody, therefore they would not hurt them—now seeing them have guns, and supposing they designed to kill the Indians, they therefore shot the men dead.” The third whose life was sacrificed was a woman, “who had remained in her habitation,” not thinking herself warranted in going “to a fortified place for preservation, neither she, her son, nor daughter, nor to take thither the little ones; but the poor woman after some time began to let in a slavish fear, and advised her children to go with her to a fort not far from their dwelling.” She went;—and shortly afterwards “the bloody, cruel Indians, lay by the way, and killed her.”*

The fate of the Quakers during the Rebellion in Ireland was nearly similar. It is well known that the Rebellion was a time not only of open war but of cold-blooded murder; of the utmost fury of bigotry, and the utmost exasperation of revenge. Yet the Quakers were preserved even to a proverb; and when strangers passed through streets of ruin and observed a house standing uninjured and alone, they would sometimes point, and say,—“That, doubtless, is the house of a Quaker.”† So complete indeed was the preservation which these people experienced, that in an official document of the Society they say,—“no member of our Society fell a sacrifice but one young man;”—and that young man had assumed regimentals and arms. ‡

* See Select Anecdotes, &c. by John Barclay, pages 71, 79.

† The Moravians, whose principles upon the subject of war are similar to those of the Quakers, experienced also similar preservation.

‡ See Hancock’s Principles of Peace Exemplified.

If it were to no purpose to say, in opposition to the evidence of these facts, that they form an exception to a general rule.—The exception to the rule consists in the trial of the experiment of non-resistance, not in its success. Neither were it to any purpose to say, that the savages of America or the desperadoes of Ireland, spared the Quakers because they were previously known to be an unoffending people, or because the Quakers had previously gained the love of these by forbearance or good offices :—we concede all this ; it is the very argument which we maintain. We say, that an uniform undeviating regard to the peaceable obligations of Christianity, becomes the safeguard of those who practice it. We venture to maintain, that no reason whatever can be assigned, why the fate of the Quakers would not be the fate of all who should adopt their conduct. No reason can be assigned why, if their number had been multiplied tenfold or a hundred-fold, they would not have been preserved. If there be such a reason, let us hear it. The American and Irish Quakers were, to the rest of the community, what one nation is to a continent. And we must require the advocate of war to produce (that which has never yet been produced) a reason for believing, that although individuals exposed to destruction were preserved, a nation exposed to destruction would be destroyed. We do not however say, that if a people, in the customary state of men's passions, should be assailed by an invader, and should, on a sudden, choose to declare that they would try whether Providence would protect them—of such a people, we do not say, that they would experience protection, and that none of them would be killed : but we say, that the evidence of experience is, that a people who habitually regard the obligations of Christianity in their conduct towards other men, and who steadfastly refuse, through whatever consequences, to engage in acts of hostility will experience protection in their peacefulness.—And it matters nothing to the argument, whether we refer that protection to the immediate agency of Providence, or to the influence of such conduct upon the minds of men.*

Such has been the experience of the unoffending and unresisting, in individual life. A national example of a refusal to bear arms, has only once been exhibited to the world: but that one example has proved, so far as its political circumstances enabled it to prove, all that humanity could desire and all that scepticism could demand, in favor of our argument.

It has been the ordinary practice of those who have colonized distant countries, to force a footing, or to maintain it, with the sword. One of the first objects has been to build a fort and to provide a military. The adventurers became soldiers, and the colony was a garrison. Pennsylvania was however colonized by men who believed that war was absolutely incompatible with Christianity, and who therefore resolved not to practice it. Having determined not to fight, they * Ramond, in his "Travels in the Pyrenees," fell in from time to time with those desperate marauders who infest the boundaries of Spain and Italy—men who are familiar with danger and robbery and blood. What did experience teach him was the most efficient means of preserving himself from injury? To go "unarmed." He found that he had "little to apprehend from men whom we inspire with no distrust or envy, and every thing to expect in those from whom we claim only what is due from man to man. The laws of nature still exist for those who have long shaken off the law of civil government."—"The assassin has been my guide in the defiles of the boundaries of Italy: the smuggler of the Pyrenees has received me with a welcome in his secret paths. Armed, I should have been the enemy of both: unarmed, they have alike respected me. In such expectation I have long since laid aside all menacing apparatus whatever. Arms irritate the wicked and intimidate the simple; the man of peace amongst mankind has a much more sacred defence—his character."

maintained no soldiers and possessed no arms. They planted themselves in a country that was surrounded by savages, and by savages who knew they were unarmed. If easiness of conquest, or incapability of defence, could subject them to outrage, the Pennsylvanians might have been the very sport of violence. Plunderers might have robbed them without retaliation, and armies might have slaughtered them without resistance. If they did not give a temptation to outrage, no temptation could be given. But these were the people who possessed their country in security, whilst those around them were trembling for their existence. This was a land of peace, whilst every other was a land of war. The conclusion is inevitable, although it is extraordinary :—they were in no need of arms, because they would not use them.

These Indians were sufficiently ready to commit outrages upon other States, and often visited them with desolation and slaughter: with that sort of desolation, and with that sort of slaughter, which might be expected from men whom civilization had not reclaimed from cruelty, and whom religion had not awed into forbearance. “But whatever the quarrels of the Pennsylvanian Indians were with others, they uniformly respected and held as it were sacred, the territories of William Penn.”* “The Pennsylvanians never lost man, woman or child by them; which neither the colony of Maryland, nor that of Virginia could say, no more than the great colony of New England.”†

The security and quiet of Pennsylvania was not a transient freedom from war, such as might accidentally happen to any nation. She continued to enjoy it “for more than seventy years,” ‡ and “subsisted in the midst of six Indian nations, without so much as a militia for her defence.”* “The Pennsylvanians became armed, though without arms; they became strong, though without strength; they became safe, without the ordinary means of safety. The constable’s staff was the only instrument of authority amongst them for the greater part of a century, and never during the administration of Penn, or that of his proper successors, was there a quarrel or a war.” †

* Clarkson.

† Oldmixon, Anno 1708.

‡ Proud.

I cannot wonder that these people were not molested—extraordinary and unexampled as their security was. There is something so noble in this perfect confidence in the Supreme Protector, in this utter exclusion of “slavish fear,” in this voluntary relinquishment of the means of injury or of defence, that I do not wonder that even ferocity could be disarmed by such virtue. A people generously living without arms amidst nations of warriors! Who would attack a people such as this? There are few men so abandoned as not to respect such confidence. It were a peculiar and an unusual intensity of wickedness that would not even revere it.

And when was the security of Pennsylvania molested, and its peace destroyed?—When the men who had directed its counsels, and who would not engage in war, were outvoted in its legislature: when they who supposed that there was a greater security in the sword than in Christianity, became the predominating body. From that hour the Pennsylvanians transferred their confidence in Christian principles, to a confidence in their arms; and from that hour to the present they have been subject to war.

Such is the evidence, derived from a national example, of the consequences of a pursuit of the Christian policy in relation to war. Here are a people who absolutely refused to fight, and who incapacitated themselves for resistance by refusing to possess arms; and these were the people whose land, amidst surrounding broils and slaughter, was selected as a land of security and peace. The only national opportunity which the virtue of the Christian world has afforded us, of ascertaining the safety of relying upon God for defence, has determined that it is safe.

* Oldmixon.

† Clarkson’s Life of Penn.

If the evidence which we possess do not satisfy us of the expediency of confiding in God, what evidence do we ask or what can we receive? We have his promise that he will protect those who abandon their seeming interests in the performance of his will; and we have the testimony of those who have confided in him, that he has protected them. Can the advocate of war produce one single instance in the history of man, of a person who had given an unconditional obedience to the will of Heaven, and who did not find that his conduct was wise as well as virtuous, that it accorded with his interests as well as with his duty. We ask the same question in relation to the peculiar obligations to irrisistance. Where is the man who regrets, that, in observance of the forbearing duties of Christianity, he consigned his preservation to the superintendence of God?—And the solitary national example that is before us, confirms the testimony of private life; for there is sufficient reason for believing, that no nation, in modern ages, has possessed so large a portion of virtue or of happiness, as Pennsylvania before it had seen human blood. I would therefore repeat the question—What evidence do we ask or can we receive?

This is the point from which we wander WE DO NOT BELIEVE IN THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD. When this statement is formally made to us, we think, perhaps, that it is not true; but our practice is an evidence of its truth; for if we did believe, we should also confide in it, and should be willing to stake upon it the consequences of our obedience,* We can talk with sufficient fluency of “trusting in Providence;” but in the application of it to our conduct in life, we know wonderfully little. Who is it that confides in Providence, and for what does he trust him? Does his confidence induce him to set aside his own views of interest and safety, and simply to obey precepts which appear inexpedient and unsafe? This is the confidence that is of value, and of which we know so little. There are many who believe that war is disallowed by Christianity, and who would rejoice that it were for ever abolished; but there are few who are willing to maintain an undaunted and unyielding stand against it. They can talk of the loveliness of peace, ay, and argue against the lawfulness of war; but when difficulty or suffering would be the consequence, they will not refuse to do what they know to be unlawful, they will not practise the peacefulness which they say they admire. Those who are ready to sustain the consequences of undeviating obedience, are the supporters of whom Christianity stands in need. She wants men who are willing to suffer for her principles.

The positions, then, which we have endeavored to establish are these—

- I. That those considerations which operate as general causes of war, are commonly such as Christianity condemns :
- II. That the effects of war, are to a very great extent, prejudicial to the moral character of a people, and to their social and political welfare :
- III. That the general character of Christianity is * “The dread of being destroyed by our enemies if we do not go to war with them, is a plain and unequivocal proof of our disbelief in the superintendence of Divine Providence.”—The Lawfulness of Defensive War impartially considered. By a member of the Church of England.

wholly incongruous with war, and that its general duties are incompatible with it :

- IV. That some of the express precepts and declarations of the Christian Scriptures virtually forbid it :
- V. That the primitive Christians believed that Christ had forbidden war : and that some of them suffered death in affirmance of this belief :
- VI. That God has declared, in prophecy, that it is His will that war should eventually be eradicated from the earth ; and that this eradication will be effected by Christianity, by the influence of its present principles :
- VII. That those who have refused to engage in war, in consequence of their belief of its inconsistency with Christianity, have found that Providence has protected them.

Now, we think that the establishment of any considerable number of these positions is sufficient for our argument. The establishment of the whole forms a body of evidence, to which I am not able to believe that an enquirer, to whom the subject was new, would be able to withhold his assent. But since such an enquirer cannot be found, I would invite the reader to lay prepossession aside, to suppose himself to have now first heard of battles and slaughter, and dispassionately to examine whether the evidence in favor of peace be not very great, and whether the objections to it bear any proportion to the evidence itself. But whatever may be the determination upon this question, surely it is reasonable to try the experiment, whether security cannot be maintained without slaughter. Whatever be the reasons for war, it is certain that it produces enormous mischief. Even waiving the obligation of Christianity, we have to choose between evils that are certain and evils that are doubtful ; between the actual endurance of a great calamity, and the possibility of a less. It certainly cannot be proved, that peace would not be the best policy : and since we know that the present system is bad, it were reasonable and wise to try whether the other is not better. In reality I can scarcely conceive the possibility of a greater evil than that which mankind now endure ; an evil, moral and physical, of far wider extent, and far greater intensity, than our familiarity with it allows us to suppose. If a system of peace be not productive of less evil than the system of war, its consequences must indeed be enormously bad ; and that it would produce such consequences, we have no warrant for believing, either from reason or from practice—either from the principles of the moral government of God, or from the experience of mankind. Whenever a people shall pursue, steadily and uniformly, the pacific morality of the gospel, and shall do this from the pure motive of obedience, there is no reason to fear for the consequences : there is no reason to fear that they would experience any evils such as we now endure, or that they would not find that Christianity understands their interests better than themselves ; and that the surest, and the only rule of wisdom, of safety, and of expediency, is to maintain her spirit in every circumstance of life.

“There is reason to expect,” says Dr. Johnson, “that as the world is more enlightened, policy and morality will at last be reconciled.”* When this enlightened period shall arrive, we shall be approaching, and we shall not till then approach, that era of purity and of peace, when “violence shall no more be heard in our land — wasting nor destruction within our borders ;”—that era in which God has promised that “they shall not hurt nor destroy in all his holy mountain." That a period like this will come, I am not able to doubt; I believe it, because it is not credible that he will always endure the butchery of man by man; because he has declared that he will not endure it; and because I think there is a perceptible approach of that period in which he will say—"it is enough."* In this belief the Christian may rejoice; he may rejoice that the number is increasing of those who are asking—"Shall the sword devour for ever?" and of those who, whatever be the opinions or the practice of others, are openly saying, "I am for Peace." †

* Falkland’s Islands.

It will perhaps be asked, what then are the duties of a subject who believes that all war is incompatible with his religion, but whose governors engage in a war and demand his service? We answer explicitly, It is his duty, mildly and temperately, yet firmly to refuse to serve.—Let such as these remember, that an honorable and an awful duty is laid upon them. It is upon their fidelity, so far as human agency is concerned, that the cause of peace is suspended. Let them then be willing to avow their opinions and to defend them. Neither let them be contented with words if more than words, if suffering also, is required. It is only by the unyielding fidelity of virtue that corruption can be extirpated. If you believe that Jesus Christ has prohibited slaughter, let not the opinions or the commands of a world induce you to join in it. By this "steady and determinate pursuit of virtue," the benediction which attaches to those who hear the sayings of God and do them, will rest upon you; and the time will come when even the world will honor you, as contributors to the work of human reformation.

* 2 Sam. xxiv. 16.

† Ps. cxx. 7.

CONCLUSION.

THAT hope which was intimated at the commencement of this volume—that a period of greater moral purity would eventually arrive—has sometimes operated as an encouragement to the writer, in enforcing the obligations of morality to an extent which few who have written such books have ventured to advocate. In exhibiting a standard of rectitude such as that which it has been attempted to exhibit here—a standard to which not many in the present day are willing to conform, and of which many would willingly dispute the authority, some encouragement was needed; and no human encouragement could be so efficient as that which consisted in the belief, that the principles would progressively obtain more and more of the concurrence and adoption of mankind.

That there are indications of an advancement of the human species towards greater purity in principle and in practice cannot, I think, be disputed. There is a manifest advancement in intellectual concerns:—Science of almost every kind is extending her empire;—political institutions are becoming rapidly ameliorated;*—and morality and religion, if their progress be less perceptible, are yet advancing with an onward pace.†

* “The degree of scientific knowledge which would once have conferred celebrity and immortality, is now, in this country, attained by thousands of obscure individuals.”—Fox’s Lectures. “To one who considers coolly of the subject, it will appear that human nature in general, really enjoys more liberty at present, in the most arbitrary governments of Europe, than it ever did during the most flourishing period of ancient times.”—Hume.

† Not that the present state, or the prospects of the world, afford any countenance to the speculations—favorite speculations with some men—respecting “human perfectibility.” In the sense in which this phrase is usually employed, I fear there Lamentations over the happiness or excellence of other times, have generally very little foundation in justice or reason.* In truth they cannot be just, because they are perpetual. There has probably never been an age in which mankind have not bewailed the good times that were departed, and made mournful comparisons of them with their own. If these regrets had not been ill-founded, the world must have perpetually sunk deeper and deeper in wickedness, and retired further and further towards intellectual night. But the intellectual sun has been visibly advancing towards its noon; and I believe there never was a period in which, speaking collectively of the species, the power of religion was greater than it is now: at least there never was a period in which greater efforts were made to diffuse the influence of religion amongst mankind. Men are to be judged of by their fruits; and why should men thus more vigorously exert themselves to make others religious, if the power of religion did not possess increased influence upon their own minds? The increase of crime—even if it increased in a progression more rapid than that of population, and the state of society which gives rise to crime—is a very little hope of the perfection of man; at least there is little hope, if Christianity be true. Christianity declares that man is not perfectible except by the immediate assistance of God; and this immediate assistance the advocates of “human perfectibility” are not wont to expect. The question in the sense in which it is ordinarily exhibited, is in reality a question of the truth of Christianity.

* “This humor of complaining proceeds from the frailty of our natures; it being natural for man to complain of the present, and to commend the times past.”—Sir Josiah Child, 1665. This was one hundred and fifty years ago. The same frailty appears to have subsisted two or three thousands of years before: “Say not thou what is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this.”—Eccles. vii 10.

imperfect standard of judgment. Those offences of which civil laws take cognizance, form not an hundredth part of the wickedness of the world. What multitudes are there of bad men who never yet were amenable to the laws ! How extensive may be the additional purity without any diminution of legal crimes!

And assuredly there is a perceptible advance in the sentiments of good men towards a higher standard of morality. The lawfulness is frequently questioned now of actions of which, a few ages ago, few or none doubted the rectitude. Nor is to be disputed, that these questions are resulting more and more in the conviction, that this higher standard is proposed and enforced by the moral law of God. Who that considers these things will hastily affirm, that doctrines in morality which refer to a standard that to him is new, are unfounded in this moral law ? Who will think it sufficient, to say that strange things are brought to his ears ? Who will satisfy himself with the exclamation, these are hard sayings, who can hear them ? Strange things must be brought to the ears of those who have not been accustomed to hear the truth. Hard sayings must be heard by those who have not hitherto practised the purity of morality.

Such considerations, I say, have afforded encouragement in the attempt to uphold a standard which the majority of mankind have been little accustomed to contemplate ;—and now and in time to come, they will suffice to encourage, although that standard should be, as by many it undoubtedly will be, rejected and condemned.

I am conscious of inadequacy—what if I speak the truth and say, I am conscious of unworthiness—thus to attempt to advocate the law of God. Let no man identify the advocate with the cause, nor imagine, when he detects the errors and the weaknesses of the one, that the other is therefore erroneous or weak. I apologize for myself: especially I apologize for those instances in which the character of the Christian may have been merged in that of the exposor of the evils of the world. There is a Christian love which is paramount to all;—a love which he only is likely sufficiently to maintain, who remembers that he who exposes an evil and he who partakes in it, will soon stand together as suppliants for the mercy of God.

And finally, having written a book which is devoted almost exclusively to disquisitions on morality, I am solicitous lest the reader should imagine that I regard the practice of morality as all that God requires of man. I believe far other, and am desirous of here expressing the conviction, that although it becomes not us to limit the mercy of God, or curiously to define the conditions on which he will extend that mercy—yet that the true and safe foundation of our hope is in “the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.”

INDEX.

	PAGE.
Affirmations instead of oaths, The advantages of, considered.....	216
Amusements not lawful when injurious to morals.....	283
—Popular, not necessary to the happiness of life.....	291
Ancient classics, The tendency of the study of, adverse to Christianity	267
Arbitration instead of litigation recommended by the early Christians..	164
—The advantages of.....	167
Benevolence as it is proposed in the Christian Scriptures.....	49
—The exercise of, required by the Divine will.....	97
—No circumstances in life, in which the exercise of, is suspended...	299
—Imperatively required of men, according to their opportuni- ties.....	315, 346
—Sets limits to patriotism.....	387
—The exercise of, incompatible with war.....	425
Books, he who writes or sells, which will in all probability injure the reader, is accessory to the mischief which may be done.....	225
—The writers of some, have probably occasioned unnumbered murders.....	238
—The great responsibility of those who derange the moral judg- ment through.....	258
—Great increase in the number of, calculated to benefit the young..	264
—The tendency of the study of the ancient classics adverse to the acceptance of Christianity.....	267
Bravery apart from courage not endued with moral qualities.....	241, 411
Brotherhood of man, Remarks on the.....	93
Ceremonial institutions and devotional formularies, On.....	123
Christ Jesus, The true and safe foundation of our hope is in the re- demption that is in.....	473
Christianity with its present principles and obligations to produce uni- versal peace.....	444
—The obligations of, binding upon nations as well as individ- uals.....	102, 318, 451
Christians, Testimony of the early, against war .....	445
Civil liberty enjoyed where the principles of political truth and recti- tude are practised.....	324
—A relative and not a positive enjoyment.....	324
—Does not necessarily depend upon forms of government.....	325
Civil obedience, The obligations of, considered .....	327
Complimentary untruths, On .....	199

	PAGE.
Conscience, The nature and authority of.....	53
—Is not an enlightening principle, but a principle which is enlight- ened.....	62
—The dictates of, to be obeyed.....	271
Courage, Christian, exemplified.....	243, 304, 335
Crime, The punishment of, considered.....	346
—The repetition of, prevented if the offender is reformed.....	347
—The effects of the death penalty upon, examined.....	351
Days, The observance of particular, as of special sanctity, not counte- nanced by Scripture .....	117
Death to be preferred to killing an assailant.....	296
Debts, Why is a man obliged to pay his.....	135
—The obligation to pay, perpetual.....	135
—A legal discharge of, by creditors not necessarily a moral dis- charge .....	135
—Until fully paid, the property of a debtor cannot in equity be con- sidered his own.....	138
—Incurred by minors.....	143
—Of unprincipled extravagance incurred by wives .....	144
—A man is unjust who will not pay his, unless compelled to do so...	146
Devotion, Remarks on sincere, and on factitious semblances of.....	112
—On formularies of.....	123
—When true, is duly maintained, forms of prayer are not needed...	129
—The offices of public, frequently do not supply opportunities for calmness of recollection.....	275
Divine attributes, On endeavoring to deduce rules of conduct from reasonings respecting the .....	25
Duelling, The obligations of morality disregarded in.....	110
—Public opinion responsible for the continuance of.....	235
Education, On moral.....	262
—Of the poor, Reasons for the general.....	277
—The, of the people effects the political welfare.....	279, 345
—The habit of inquiry a valuable effect of.....	281
Enjoyment, The greatest sum of, that which is quietly and constantly induced.....	290
Example, The necessity of virtuous as an agency in moral reform, in- culcated.....	223
—The powerful influence of, particularly of parents.....	263
Expediency not the standard of right and wrong.....	4
Expediency, The principles of, fluctuating and inconsistent.....	6
—The doctrine of, examined, and condemned.....	13, 47, 196, 265
—Obligations resulting from.....	96
—European politics have long been founded on.....	322
Falsehood and deception.....	188, 216
—Encouraged by the use of oaths.....	221
Fame, Enduring, to be accorded to him who is good as well as great....	254
Faults of great men, Animadversions on the disposition to treat the, leniently .....	254

	PAGE.
Field-sports, The ill effects of .....	287
First day of the week, On the rightful observance of the, as a day for the exercise of public worship.....	117
Forbearance, The nature and effects of Christian .....	304
Gambling, Remarks on paying debts incurred in .....	109
—A general accompaniment of horse-racing.....	289
Government, The authority and limits of civil .....	82
—The authority of, explicitly asserted in the Christian Scriptures..	82
—Injustice, etc., committed by, would be much lessened if repu- table men did not lend their agency.....	229
—The servant of the community .....	310
—Measures of, should commend themselves to the judgment and affections of the people.....	313
—Obedience to, enforced both by expediency and Christianity.....	327
—When obedience to, may be withdrawn.....	331
—Alterations in, may be effected by Christian methods.....	331
—The proper object of, the happiness of the people.....	342
History, The rectification of public opinion on important subjects may be largely aided by writers on.....	260
—The sickening details of, in Europe largely due to vicious and mistaken principles of government.....	317
Holy Scriptures, Moral legislation as exhibited in the, is a system founded upon authority .....	9
—The will of God when communicated through the, is final.....	10
—Those who have not the, are not destitute of a direct communi- cation of the will of God.....	20
—Of the Patriarchal, Mosaic and Christian dispensations the latter are of paramount obligation.....	29
—On the mode of applying the precepts of, to questions of duty.....	37
—The wide practical applicability of precepts of the, an argument of great wisdom.....	43
—Remarks on certain precepts in the, of general application.....	44
—Testimony of the, to the immediate communication of the will of God .....	70
—The authority of civil government explicitly asserted in the.....	82
—Oaths forbidden by the New Testament .....	204
—The dispositions which lead to war condemned by the.....	425
Horse-racing an amusement of almost unmingled evil.....	289
Houses of infamy.....	154
Infidelity, There is no rest to the mind, in the reasonings of .....	35
—Professed by those who usually do not know what Christianity is	130
—Professed by some from motives which are contemptible or de- testable.....	132
Immoral agency of reputable men, On the .....	223
Insane, The most scrupulous observance of good faith necessary in the treatment of the .....	197
Insolvency, The obligations which morality enjoins in reference to.....	135
—The dishonesty of endeavoring to obtain credit by deceptive appearances.....	151
Introversion of mind a great auxiliary of moral character.....	275

	PAGE
Judicial oaths prohibited by Jesus Christ.....	208
Judgment of actions should be formed with reference to the motives, Our.....	28
Law of honor, The character and obligation of the.....	108
Law of the land, The authority and limits of the.....	82
—Not everything which is in accordance with the, is morally right.....	85, 171
—Arbitration to be preferred to the, in the settlement of disputes...	164
—Equity at times sacrificed to the.....	171
—The temptations and difficulties met by the conscientious lawyer resulting from the general system of the.....	184
Law of nations, Obligations and authority of the.....	102
Law of nature, The authority and limits of the authority of the.....	89
—Involves no obligation but that which is imposed by the Divine will.....	96
Law of rectitude, An internal, to be implicitly obeyed .....	270
Laws. Useless, do harm.....	326
Legal practice, The morality of, examined .....	170, 251
—Effects of, upon the personal character of the profession.....	186
—The probable results of sterling integrity in reforming.....	187
Lies, always, and for whatever purpose prohibited by the Divine will..	194
Libraries in many cases, a source of moral injury.....	228
Litigation discouraged by the early Christians.....	164
Legislation, The primary object of, to promote virtue .....	342
Love, The inculcation of in the Christian Scriptures, as of paramount obligation, a characteristic of the present dispensation.....	49
Magistrate, Obedience to the, enforced by Christianity.....	327, 348
—The powers of the, cease, when it becomes immoral to obey.....	336
Masquerades afford to many an opportunity for covert licentiousness..	286
Military glory, The desire for, a powerful incentive to war.....	238, 403
—Destined to sink into forgetfulness.....	247, 404
Ministry of the gospel, A theological education not necessary to the .....	379
—Stated remuneration for the, adapted to an imperfect state of the Christian church.....	380
—Voluntary payment in connection with the, considered .....	380
—The ill effects of paying for preaching.....	382
—The qualifications for the, stated.....	385
Moral education, On.....	272
—The requisites necessary in.....	263
Moral law, The, as exhibited in the Christian Scriptures of paramount authority.....	29
Moral legislation, The promotion of virtue, and the punishment of vice the two objects of.....	342
Moral obligation, The foundation of .....	1
—Identical authority of, with religious obligation.....	23
Moral sense, Review of opinions respecting a.....	61
Morality founded upon a law written externally, and a law communi- cated to the heart.....	81
—Religion the basis of.....	263

	PAGE
Morality of legal practice examined, The.....	170
—The injury to, by war.....	409
—An advance towards a higher standard of, perceptible.....	472
—The practice of, not all that God requires of man.....	473
Music, The deceptive effects of sacred, upon the mind .....	113
Nations, The principles of morality are binding upon as well as upon individuals .....	102, 318, 451
—The claims of, to other countries by right of discovery, considered .....	105
—Treaties do not oblige, to do that which is morally wrong .....	107
—The greatest resource of, a strict attention to the principles of justice.....	322
Newspapers, The great influence, and corresponding responsibility connected with the publication of.....	258
Oaths, Moral objections to the use of.....	201
—All, forbidden by Jesus Christ.....	204
—Judicial, prohibited.....	208
—The efficacy of, as securities for veracity examined.....	211
—Proved to be needless.....	219
—Tend powerfully to deprave the moral character.....	220
—Refusing to take, obligatory upon the Christian.....	222
Oratorios, etc., do not promote religion.....	286
Parents, The duty of, to strengthen the moral character of the child, 266, 272
—Obedience of children to, necessary .....	272
—Should frequently refer children to the dictates of an enlightened conscience in their own minds.....	273
Patriotism, The virtue of, extravagantly overrated.....	245
—As viewed by Christianity.....	387
—Does not imply the injury of others.....	390
—The, manifested in political partizanship often of a questionable kind.....	390
Penn, William, The sound principles acted upon by, in acquiring rights in Pennsylvania .....	106
Pennsylvania, Religious liberty in, promotivè of harmony .....	376
—Colonized by those who believed that war is incompatible with Christianity.....	462
—Security and quiet of, without war for more than seventy years..	463
Political affairs, Men are not exempt from the obligations of the moral law in.....	229
—Truth, The fundamental principles of.....	308
—Power possessed only by the consent of the community .....	309
—Is rightly exercised only when it subserves the welfare of the community.....	314
—Influence and patronage considered.....	338
—Often resorted to, to obtain concurrence with measures of doubtful rectitude .....	339
Prayer, The use of forms of, considered.....	127
—Acceptable, that only which is according to the will of God .....	129
Promises, On the obligation of.....	188
—Not binding if performance is unlawful .....	190
Property, On the foundation of the right to .....	133

	PAGE
—The law of the land not always a sufficient warrant for maintaining possession of.....	134
—The obligations of morality respecting the distribution of, among legatees and heirs .....	140
—On the plundering of, by privateering.....	146
—The acceptance of confiscated, sometimes irreconcilable with integrity .....	148
—Endangering the, of others by speculation, dishonest.....	150
—The immorality of accepting returns from certain kinds of literary .....	154
—A limit to be observed to the accumulation of .....	156
—The taking of life, in the protection of, not lawful.....	302
Providence of God, Violations of the precepts of Christianity, resulting from an unbelief in the .....	465
Public opinion, the great influence of, upon the practice of virtue.....	231
—The misdirection of, an obstacle to virtue .....	233
—Reformations resulting from an enlightened.....	280
Punishment, The proper ends of .....	346
The reformation of the offender the primary object of.....	348
Punishment of death, The, regards but one of the three objects of punishment.....	351
—The defenders of, do not take into account the dictates of Christianity .....	352
—Examples of, not efficient in deterring from crime.....	354
—The effect of, very hardening upon other criminals.....	356
—Public executions believed to promote both murder and suicide... ..	357
—Punishments of a milder nature produce a far more powerful effect .....	358
—Arguments in favor of, examined.....	359
—Sentence of, pronounced at times upon grounds necessarily uncertain .....	362
—Speculations of philosophers upon, considered.....	363
Rectitude, To deviate from, impolitic as well as wrong.....	323
Religious and moral obligations, The authority of, identical.....	23, 299
—Feelings, The legitimate effects of, upon the character.....	114
—Conversation, The danger of, in enfeebling religious character... ..	115
—Ceremonies, The obligation of, to be constituted by an expression of the Divine will.....	123
—Establishment, A, defined.....	365
—No, existed until the church had lost much of its purity .....	367
—Establishments, The utility of, considered.....	369
—No evidence in favor of, afforded by a comparison with communities where they do not exist... ..	371
—Arguments in favor of, examined.....	371
—Temptations held out by, to equivocation and hypocrisy.....	373
—Generate ill will and animosities.....	376
—Incompatible with complete religious liberty.....	377
—Persecution has generally been the work of.....	378
Resistance to aggression, The duty of, considered.....	304
Rewards, A man of integrity would not accept, for being honest.....	155
Sabbatical institutions considered.....	117

	PAGE
Scepticism entertained by those usually who do not know what Christianity is .....	130
Self-defence, The limits of the rights of .....	93, 295, 454
Standard of right and wrong is the will of God, The.....	2
Standards of right and wrong, Subordinate, considered.....	21
Suicide, The effects of religion in arming the mind against the temptations to.....	292
"Sunday papers" ill adapted to the cultivation of religious feeling.....	121
Swearing forbidden by Jesus Christ.....	201
Theatre, All who attend the, promote its tendency to evil .....	284
Treaties do not oblige nations to do that which is morally wrong.....	107
Unchastity, The reprobation of, in men, should be greatly increased....	253
Utility, Obligations resulting from considerations of.....	96
—Cannot be properly consulted without taking into account our interests in futurity.....	98
—The dictates of, deplorably disregarded, in affairs relating to the moral and religious welfare of mankind.....	100
Virtue defined to be conformity with the standard of rectitude.....	27
—Is real wisdom.....	100
—The best promoter of the general welfare.....	342
War, The frequency of, largely due to a misdirection of public opinion, 237
—The real character of military virtues considered.....	238
—The motives of those who perish in, examined.....	244
—The obligations of religion and morality in reference to.....	247
—A great cause of the diminution of civil liberty.....	325
—The Revolutionary, might have been avoided, had the Americans acted on Christian principles.....	334
—The enquiry spreading in the world, whether, is compatible with the Christian religion.....	392
—The causes of, considered.....	395
—The desire for military glory a powerful incentive to.....	403
—One of the consequences of, the wide-spread, silent misery of the people.....	407
—The dreadful destruction of mankind by .....	407
—National debts largely caused by.....	408
—The depravity of the people from.....	409
—Servility of individual character a result of.....	411
—The reign of wickedness in a community accompanying.....	418
—The lawfulness of, considered.....	420
—Testimonies of eminent men respecting.....	423
—The Christian Scriptures condemn the dispositions which lead to	425
—Cannot be carried on without violating the commands of Christ...	427
—Arguments of those who defend, examined.....	434
—Prophecies of the Old Testament that Christianity will be the means of abolishing .....	443
—Testimony of the early Christians against.....	445
—All, is aggressive .....	453
—Wholly forbidden by Christianity.....	457

	PAGE
—The probable effects of adhering to the moral law in respect to ...	458
—The preservation of Quakers in America and Ireland during.....	459
—The evils of, greater than any that could be expected by the abandonment of .....	467
—The duty of those who believe that, is incompatible with religion	469
Wealth, Proper limits to the acquisition of, to be observed .....	156
—A pernicious inequality in the distribution of, among children to be avoided .....	161
Will of God is the standard of right and wrong, The....	2, 10
—Notice of different theories respecting the.....	3
—The communication of the.....	6
—Both moral and religious obligations are founded on the .....	24
—On the immediate communication of the, to the mind of man.....	52, 58, 270
Wills, Legatees and heirs, Moral considerations respecting.....	140, 161
Worship of God, Remarks on true and factitious semblances of.....	113
—The effects of ceremonial observances in connection with the, considered.....	123, 275
—The presence of a minister not necessary for the performance of public .....	385

14 DAY USE
RETURN TO DESK FROM WHICH BORROWED LOAN DEPT.

This book is due on the last date stamped below, or on the date to which renewed.

Renewed books are subject to immediate recall.

IN STACKS
JAN 14 1958
REC'D IN AUG 13 73 - 4 PM	7
DEC 2 9 1976	*
APR 17 1979

LD 21A-50m-8, '57
(C8481s10)476B

Gener University
Berke.

BJ100

D9

1896

72392

